THE GENTLEMAN AND THE BULL DOG

[An Engraving to serve as the Frontispiece to the Eighteenth Volume.]

THIS Print represents an engagement that actually took place (for a wager) some time ago, between a Gentleman and a Bull-Dog.

On the sett too, the Bull Dog so far mastered his adversary as to bring him to the ground; and, notwithstanding the animal's mouth was nearly closed by the muzzle, he fastened on the body of the gentleman; and, if not instantly taken off, would have torn out his bowels.

[It is to be noticed that part of the following articles, to the end of page 287 (first half sheet) are of subsequent events to those in the body of our Miscellany, and occasioned by the first half sheet going to press last; a constant practice in printing Magazines, by reason, that the whole Contents should appear in the Title Page; and which could not be, were not the first half sheet kept back, until the whole of the others are printed.]

DONCASTER. — SIR SOLOMON AND COCKFIGHTER'S PEDIGREES, &c. &c.

A correct return of the Races at Doncaster, will appear in our next Calendar. At present, we have the following interesting particulars to lay before our readers:

THE famous match between Sir H. Vane's Cockfighter, and Mr. Johnson's Sir Solomon, was run on Saturday, the 19th of September, at Doncaster, and won by the latter with great ease!—The result has disappointed the sporting men, who backed Cockfighter, on whom the odds in London were 5 and 6 to 4; in Yorkshire, among the common people, all of whom are sportsmen, 2 to 1; and, on the field, the day of the race, 5 to 4, and 11 to 8. Cockfighter was looked upon as one of the best horses in the country, having won every thing; and, being a Yorkshire horse, and the property of Sir H. Vane, great confidence was placed in him. Sir Solomon was also known to be an excellent horse; he has won every thing this year, and particularly distinguished himself at Newcastle Races. Cockfighter was rode by one of Sir H. T. Vane's stable boys; Sir Solomon was rode by Shepherd, one of the best Yorkshire jockeys. They carried equal weights. Not only did Cockfighter lose, but, it seems, he had no chance with his antagonist, whom he never once headed, and Sir Solomon won in a canter. Vast sums of money were depending; not less, perhaps, than 50,000l. The whole sporting world went from London to be present at the match, and a great crowd of the first nobility and gentry of the North were present. The horses ran the distance (four miles) in seven

ven minutes and ten seconds. It is not believed that Sir H. Vane had more money depending than the stake of 500gs named in the list.

Mr. Johnson, the owner of Sir Solomon, is a gentleman of large fortune in the North, who never comes to London, but sports freely on the Turf, keeps fine racers, and is deemed a good judge.

SIR SOLOMON.—This horse, now considered as the Hero of the Turf, was bred by Earl Fitzwilliam, and originally called Tankersley *. He is the son of Lord Derby's Sir Peter; his dam by Florizel, out of an own sister to the dam of Rockingham. As a colt, he never discovered any great speed; but was considered as an uncertain runner, restive, and liable to bolt.

In 1799, he started six times without winning any thing; and after being fifth to Cockfighter, for the St. Leger Stakes, he was thought so indifferent, that his Lordship parted with him.

In 1800, when the property of Mr. Johnson, he also started six times, and won three; viz. the King's Plate, and Fifty Guineas, at Nottingham; and the King's Plate at York.

Since then, he has trained on considerably, and this season has been very successful, having won the Stand Plate at York, the King's Plate and Gold Cup, with One Hundred and Thirty Guineas, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne; the Gold Cup, with Thirty Guineas, at Nottingham; and his match abovementioned, with Cockfighter, at Doncaster; which last performance ranks him as the first horse in England.

Sir Solomon, since running the above match, has been beat; he came in second for the Gold Cup, at Doncaster, on the Wednesday following, which was won by Mr. Wentworth's Chance. This, however, does not depreciate his value, as he must have lost in consequence of carrying greater weight than the winner.

* The name of a place in Yorkshire where he was foaled.

FURTHER PARTICULARS

Of the late Race between Cockfighter and Sir Solomon.

ANOTHER correspondent, in his account of the Grand Match between Sir Solomon and Cockfighter, says, the betting was 6 to 4 and 11 to 8 on Cockfighter. Sir Solomon took the lead, was never headed, beat his antagonist three-fourths of a mile from home in a very capital style, and by about a length and half at the ending-post. Cockfighter ran a very honest beaten horse. The first two miles was run in three minutes, and the whole of the four miles in seven minutes and between ten and eleven seconds. The course at Doncaster (twice round for four miles) is four hundred and eight yards short of four miles, or three miles three-quarters thirty-two yards.

The same correspondent, speaking of the above race between Cockfighter and Sir Solomon, adds, we wish to observe to those not thoroughly acquainted with the Turf, that the shortness of time, and the uncommon rate at which the horses went, accompanied with the hardness of Doncaster Course on Saturday, will, on consideration, sufficiently account for Sir Solomon and Cockfighter's being beat for the Cup and Doncaster Stakes on Wednesday; especially when it is understood that they both had to contend against one of the best four-year old colts in the kingdom. We remember, at York, in 1796, Beningbrough and Ormond, who were allowed to be two of the best horses horses in their years (five years old and aged), that, from similar circumstances on the Saturday, the former was beat on the Wednesday following by Eliza, when the odds were greatly in his favour; and Ormond was also beat by Screveton the next day.

COCKFIGHTER.

Cockfighter was bred by Mr. Wm. Richardson, of Malton, and got by Overton; dam, called Palmflower, by Weasel; grand dam, called Columba (own sister to Elfleda, Columbus, and Kathleen), by Alfred (son of Match'm, Snap, and Cullen Arabian); great grand dam, by Engineer (son of Sampson, Young Greyhound, and Curwen Bay Barb); great great grand dam (Bay Malton's dam), by Cade (son of the Godolphin Arabian and Bald Galloway); out of Mr. Clarke's Lass of the Mill, by Traveller (son of Partner, Almanzor, and Grey Hautboy).—Traveller was sire of Mr. Shafto's Squirrel.

Overton (sire of Cockfighter) was got by King Fergus; his dam by Herod (son of Tartar and Blaze); grand dam by Snip (son of Childers, Basto, and Curwen Bay Barb); out of the own sister to Regulus, by the Godolphin Arabian, Bald Galloway, Snake, and Old Hautboy.

Weasel (sire of the dam of Cockfighter) was got by Herod; his dam by Eclipse (son of Marsk, Regulus, and Smith's son of Snake); grand dam by Brilliant (son of Panton's Crab, Godolphin Arabian, and Bald Golloway); great grand dam by Shepherd's Crab (son of Panton's Crab, Widdrington Mare, by Partner, Bloody-Buttocks); great great grand dam (own sister to Mr. Vernon's Amelia) by the Godolphon Arabian, Childers, True Blue, Cyprus Arabian, out of Bonny Back, by Black Hearty.

King Fergus (sire of Overton) was got by Eclipse; his dam, Mr. Tuting's Polly, by Black-and-all-Black (son of Crab, Miss Slamerkin, Duchess's dam, by True Blue); grandam, Mr. Blake's Fanny, by Tartar (sire of Herod); great grand dam by the Bolton Starling (son of Bay Bolton); great great grand dam by the Bolton Starling (son of Bay Bolton); great great grand dam by Roundhead (son of Childers, and Cade and Lath's dam, by the Bald Galloway). Mr. Tuting's Polly was also the dam of the two speedy horses Pincher and Pontifex.

Tartar (sire of Herod) was got by Partner (son of Jigg, and sister to Mixbury, by the Curwen Bay Barb); his dam, Mr. Witty's Meliora, by Lord Portmore's Fox (son of Clumsy, and Leedes's Arabian); grand dam, Milkmaid, by Sir W. Blackett's Snail, out of the Shield's Galloway.

Fox got Mr. Panton's Slipby; and Mr. Shafto's Snap was out of an own sister to Slipby.

In 1721, Flying Childers (carrying 9st. 2lb.) ran a trial against Almanzor and Brown Betty, over the Round Course at Newmarket, in six minutes and 40 seconds; and over the Beacon Course, in seven minutes and 30 seconds. The Round Course is three miles and three quarters and 103 yards in length; and the Beacon Course is four miles and 358 yards in length.

In 1755, Match'em and Trajan (carrying 8st. 7lb. each) ran over the Beacon Course in seven minutes and 20 seconds.

At York, in August, 1766, Bay Malton ran over the Four-mile Course, in seven minutes and 43 seconds and a half, against Jerkin, Royal George, Flyfax, Beaufremont, and King Herod, which was seven seconds and a half less time than the Course was ever run before.

fore. The first four were six years old, and carried 8st. 7lb. each; and the two last were aged horses, and carried 9st.

And in March 1799, Hambletonian, 8st. 3lb. and Diamond, 8st. ran the Beacon Course at Newmarket, in seven minutes and 15 seconds.

MORE COURSING.

[The Article of Coursing, page 295, in the present Number, and which first appeared in a Newspaper, has drawn forth the following Letter in the same Paper.]

TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,

SEEING in your Paper a very long paragraph relative to a Greyhound, written by some person very little acquainted with the subject, I beg leave to make some remarks upon it, which I hope you will insert by way of explanation.

Much has been said of the greyhound Snowball; he has certainly proved himself a good runner, but has always shewn himself inferior, when tried against his brother Major, and still more so against his aunt, the unrivalled Cyarina. It is admitted that he has beat a great many mongrels.

Major was not, I believe a present, as stated, from Major Topham to Colonel Thornton, but was transferred in consequence of Colonel Thornton's Claret being permitted to improve Major Topham's breed, by warding a bitch (certainly by far the best the Major could produce): if she proved with whelp, Colonel Thornton was to have one half of the litter. A brace (of which Major was one) was sent to Colonel Thornton; of course he was not a present, as stated. Major was never beat but by Cyarina, nor is it likely, from the very great superiority he shewed over Snowball, and also against Major Topham's Dent bitch, at Flixton, that he ever will.

That Flixton is the most celebrated county for coursing is very true. The hares are so stout, that three, four, and even five or six miles, are frequently run. They are generally found on the side of a hill to the North, which they invariably ascend; they then have a flat down for three or four miles, then a steep descent, after which they ascend a hill almost perpendicular, at the top of which is a large whin, or goss cover, and into which they have beat many a capital brace of greyhounds. It was up this very hill that Major ran, and so very much beat Major Topham's Dent last Spring. As to the Norfolk coursing, it is only intended, from the nature of the ground, to amuse old women and young children.

At the Flixton Meeting, which commences the 24th of November next, the Norfolk, Wiltshire, Staffordshire, and Derbyshire greyhounds, are engaged to run, and then it will be fairly tried whether the Dents or other blood is the best.—Major is matched to run for 500 guineas the last day of that meeting.

Mr. Swinfen has been improperly called Captain Swinsen, a Derbyshire gentleman. He is Mr. Swinfen, of Swinfen Hall, Staffordshire, well known on the Turf; one of the best sportsmen in every branch, and one of the best landlords; but we believe he has not the honour to hold any commisson in the King's service. The writer of the paragraph seems to anticipate the annihilation of fox-hunting in this world; it is hoped he will not throw an additional damp, by assuring us there will be none in the next.

☞ The Editor of the Newspaper alluded to says, by way of note—"We know that that the above comes from a distinguished Sporting Gentleman, and we shall be obliged to him for his future Correspondence."

[The distinguished Sporting Gentleman here meant, we conceive to be no other than Colonel Thornton.]

A CHALLENGE.

MR. EDITOR,

We have read a great deal about the matchless excellence of the Yorkshire Greyhounds, with some sarcastic allusions to the inferiority of the dogs and sport of other counties. I request, therefore, to be informed by some of those Yorkshire sportsmen, through the channel of the Morning Herald Newspaper, "whether they are disposed to run, home and home, a cash of greyhounds, the boná fide property of one person in their crack county, with the same number, the property of a gentleman in one of those unfortunate counties, where, as they tell us, "the sport is only fit for old Ladies:" or, "whether they will produce six brace, to run, county against county, on similar terms?" On either of these fair grounds, those Yorkshire sportsmen may depend upon being gratified with a triumph, or taught a necessary lesson of moderation and candour. Your's, &c.

THE GREAT BUSTARD.

The Subject of the Vignette to the Eighteenth Volume of our Work, is the GREAT BUSTARD, of which famous Bird, the ingenious Mr Bewick gives the following account in his History of British Birds:—

THIS very singular bird, which is the largest of our land birds, is about four feet long, and weighs from twenty-five to thirty pounds; its characters are peculiar, and with such as connect it with birds of the gallinaceous kind, it has others which seem to belong to the Ostrich and the Cassowary: its bill is strong, and rather convex; its eyes red; on each side of the lower bill there is a tuft of feathers about nine inches long; its head and neck are ash-coloured. In the one described by Edwards, there were on each side of the neck two naked spots, of a violet colour, but which appeared to be covered with feathers when the neck was much extended. The back is barred transversely with black and bright rust colour; the quills are black; the belly white; the tail consists of twenty feathers, the middle ones are rust colour, barred with black—those on each side are white, with a bar or two of black near the ends; the legs are long, naked above the knees, and dusky; it has no hind toe; its nails are short, strong, and convex, both above and below; the bottom of the foot is furnished with a callous prominence, which serves instead of a heel. The female is not much more than half the size of the male: the top of her head is of a deep orange, the rest of the head brown; her colours are not so bright as those of the male, and she wants the tuft on each side of the head. There is likewise another very essential difference between the male and the female; the former is furnished with a sack or pouch, situated in the fore part of the neck, and capable of containing about two quarts; the entrance to it is immediately under the tongue*. This singular reservoir was first discovered by Dr. Douglas, who supposes that the bird fills it with water, as a supply in the midst of those dreary plains where it is accustomed to wander; it likewise makes a further use of it in defending itself against the attacks of birds of prey; on such occasions it throws out the water with such violence, as not unfrequently to baffle the pursuit of its enemy.

Bustards were formerly more frequent in this island than at present. They are now found only in the open countries of the South and East, in the plains of Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, and in some parts of Yorkshire; they were formerly met with in Scotland, but are now supposed to be extinct there. They are slow in taking wing, but run with great rapidity, and when young, are sometimes taken with greyhounds, which pursue them with great avidity.—The chase is said to afford excellent diversion.

The Great Bustard is granivorous, feeding on herbs and grain of various kinds; it is also fond of those worms which are seen to come out of the ground in great numbers before sun-rise in the summer; in winter it frequently feeds on the bark of trees. Like the Ostrich, it swallows small stones*, bits of metal, and the like. The female makes no nest, but, making a hole in the ground, she drops two eggs, about the size of those of a goose, of a pale olive brown, with dark spots: she sometimes leaves her eggs in quest of food; and if, during her absence, any one should handle, or even breathe upon them, she immediately abandons her nest. Bustards are found in various parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa, but have not hitherto been discovered on the New Continent.

* In the stomach of one which was opened by the academicians, there were found, besides small stones, to the number of ninety doubloons, all worn and polished by the attrition of the stomach.—Buff.

The Cat and the Rat.

[An Etching by Mr. Howitt.]

HOWEVER averse cats may be to water, or disinclined ever to wet their feet, yet when the force of nature urges them in the pursuit of their prey, common antipathies will not impede their ardour; as an instance, on the 17th of June last, three gentlemen went to dine at the Orchard House, Blackwall, one of them heard a rustling amongst the leaves and rushes at the side of the ditch, which separates the Dock Yard from the Road. He called to his friends to notice what was going forward, when, in a moment, a Tortoishell Cat, with a Rat in its mouth, emerged from the ditch dripping wet, and ran with her prey over the Meadow to a Cottage.

Extraordinary Diversion.

EARLY on Monday morning, September 21, a covey of 12 partridges came up to the old shambles in Newark market-place, and being unaccustomed to such situations, instead of raising themselves to a sufficient height, flew against the houses, and immediately fell to the pavement, where, after running in various directions for some time, they were all picked up by their astonished and alert pursuers.

Mr. Parkyns, of Saltash, in Cornwall, has a spaniel who carries victuals to an old blind dog, in a ruin at a distance from the town, except on Sunday, when he conducts him to the house to dinner, and leads him by the ear back again to his lodging.

The Life, Adventures, and Opinions, of Col. George Hanger.

HAVING already mentioned the extravagance and excesses of the nobility and private gentlemen at the west end of the town, it will be but fair, in return, to take a view of the honest merchant and citizen at the east end. The first question he asks his friend, when he rises in the morning is, "How are stocks?"—"Very flat, indeed."—"How is omnium?"—"Much the same as yesterday."—"My dear friend, is there no hopes of sugars rising? I bought up a great quantity in the market, and have them now on hand."—"None whatever: there has been no hurricane in the West Indies this season, and the crops were abundant."—"That, my friend, is very unfortunate; and, above all, there is no hopes now of the enemy capturing the homeward-bound West-India fleet, from the great superiority we have at sea: formerly, and in other wars, we speculators had some chance, even when the market was glutted with sugars, or any other article of trade, to sell them to some advantage, or at least not lose by them, when the product lay but in few hands: however, I am determined to stand my chance, for I won't sell at the present indifferent price; and, as I bought them two per cent. cheaper than they now are, I can't be a great loser."—"Pray, my friend, have you heard how provisions are? are they likely to be cheaper?"—"I am afraid not, for bread will rise two assizes next Thursday; and meat, cheese, and bacon, are extremely dear also."—"Why, then, on Thursday bread will be eighteen-pence the quartern loaf. My God! how can the poor live if the farmers and cornfactors are permitted to hoard up the grain?" *—There being no demand for rum or sugars, and stocks being very flat, nothing is to be done that day in the Alley: he, therefore, goes to the coffee-house to hear the news; when, taking up a paper, he reads—Yesterday, Lord A—— lost seven thousand pounds at hazard, at Miles's Club, St. James's-street; and Mr. B. five thousand pounds, the same night, at Brooks's. Turning to an acquaintance near him, he exclaims, "Good God! Sir, how shocking is the passion that some men have for play! The extravagance, vice, and proflicacy of the men of fashion of the present age, are beyond all belief, not only distressing themselves by play, but reducing their wives and family to beggary! It is horrid indeed, Sir!"—"and will not bear reflection," replies his neighbour. Now this very man, not a fortnight before, at the last settling day, gained ten thousand pounds by speculating in the Alley. But this is not all the honest citizen does: if he did no worse than speculate with his own money, he would be the only sufferer, and surely might readily be forgiven, and even pitied if unfortunate. But, what monsters in wickedness have we witnessed amongst these honest citizens, by involving whole families of industrious people, who have entrusted them with their little all, the savings of many years' labour, in their own ruin! then, not daring to live, they seek the refuge that is to be found in suicide.

One monster in atrocity, superlatively nefarious, exceeding by far all other culprits, and who has comprehended a far greater number of individuals in his ruin than we have before heard of: besides the numbers who have been very large sufferers, one lady, by his baseness and treachery, lost thirty thousand pounds; and a young lady, an heiress, whose sole property was in his possession, lost her all to the amount of sixty thousand pounds; yet this miscreant lies buried, I doubt not, with a very flaming inscription on his tomb stome, setting forth every virtue which he did not possess. It were juster by far that the following epitaph should adorn his sepulchre:

* This is the public cant the honest merchant holds, at the same time he has one hundred thousand pounds of rum and sugars in his stores, purchased on speculation to sell again.

> Hic jacet ——— *******.
> Alieni appetens alienique profusus;
> Who robbed the hangman of his fees;
> And by suicide deprived the laws of a just revenge.

Had this wretch, indeed, robbed no one but the hangman, it had been well; but, by a death too sudden, he has added to his other robberies that of robbing the world of its right to hold him up to public infamy, and to make him a terrible example.

Enough of such monsters!—Let us now view the real honest money-making censorious citizen of London, (for he also can descant at large on the vices and excesses of the age) and let us enquire of what real benefit or use he is of to society at large: he is but little better than the Dutch merchant, whose soul is his till, and looks up to God only through the crevice by which the money passes into it: he walks in no temple but his counting-house, and has no faith but in his banker, and his heart-strings and his purse-strings are synonymous terms. In the morning he goes to the Exchange, is occupied all the forenoon, and best part of the day, in making money; goes home to dinner, gormandises at table, and gets drunk after; goes to bed, rises the next morning to repeat his daily labours; gets drunk again, is cuckolded, and dies. A fortnight after his burial, his son makes water on his grave; his favourite dog follows the young master's example; and this hopeful youth, for whom he has been toiling for many years, takes as much pains to spend the fortune, as his father did to acquire it.

A good merchant is a good man; and a good man is a good merchant: it is also said, that a good mason is a good man; and that a good man also is a good mason. I do not dispute it; but it reminds me of sharpers tossing up for money with fools, and crying heads I win, tails you lose.

I now return to a more interesting object: need I inform my readers that I mean myself?

After a few years enjoyment of every pleasure and satisfaction in life, which that age of pleasure, extravagance, and elegance, was calculated to afford, a sudden and unforeseen event took place, the result of which I have ever had cause to repent from that early hour to the present moment. I do not wish to rip up old grievances, especially as one of the parties who profited at my expence is dead, and the other is a near friend. It is sufficient to say, that I conceived myself most unjustly treated relative to a promotion that took place in the first regiment of foot guards, in which corps I had then the honour of being an ensign. Great parliamentary interest was the cause of it, to the entire destruction of my promotion in a service to which I was most devoutly attached; and of which I resolved to experience the substance, not the disgraceful empty shadow of parading about the streets of London, with the outward flimsy insignia of a soldier, a cockade, and red coat. This I evinced by voluntarily going into the

the Hessian service to America very shortly after. Had I remained in the first regiment of guards, I should at this moment have had the honour of commanding that regiment for above a twelvemonth; which the rotation of names here mentioned will plainly prove to my old friends, the brigade of guards; they were as follow:—D'Oyley, Duff, Strickland, Fanshaw, Edmonstone, Hanger. My old acquaintance, General D'Oyley, has long been out of the regiment; soon after the Helder expedition. Duff, before him, had a regiment. Strickland quitted the regiment and retired as a private gentleman, and is since dead. Fanshaw sold out, and went into the Russian service, in which, a very few years ago, he was still living. Edmonstone died aid-de-camp to General Rictarell, the commander in chief of the German troops under General Burgoyne in Canada. Next came a youth, not much favoured by fortune or by fame, your humble servant, George Hanger. My gallant and old friend, George Ludlow, (General Ludlow,) who now commands the first regiment of guards, was not above half-way up the ensigns when I quitted the regiment, with four captains junior to me. This statement will prove to those who are conversant with the promotion of the army, in what an high situation I should have stood in point of rank and command, had I remained in the guards. I quitted the guards at the period when the American war commenced, in which fate destined me to serve. With a heartfelt satisfaction I reflect that I had the sense of my regiment with me, who wished me to remain with them, and felt the injury I had sustained: and with so favourable an eye did that distinguished officer and true friend to a soldier, General Hervey, view my case, as to tell me, that if I would draw up a memorial, he would present it to the King. All my friends advised me to remain in the regiment; and my worthy friend, that enlightened commander, Sir William Draper, in particular advised me so to do. I never shall forget his words,—"You are used very ill, but you cannot contend against power: put up with it, and use it at some future period as a plea to be served." But I was too young to take advice, and too haughty and high in blood tamely to brook an injury without resenting it, or shewing all the indignation I felt on the occasion. Deaf to all advice, and blind to my own interest, vexed, heated, and agitated with an honest consciousness of the wrongs I had suffered, I resolved on quitting the guards, and of serving in the Hessian troops in America. I gave in my resignation, but never mentioned my intentions to any soul living, except to my worthy, old, and dear friend and protector, Lord Southampton, then General Fitzroy. I cannot pass over in silence the many favours and friendships I received from that accomplished and excellent person. I should be guilty of the basest ingratitude did I not acknowledge them. He was my kind friend and sage adviser through life: and with truth I can say, that whenever I followed his advice, I prospered; and when I failed to consult him, I was always unsuccessful. I am vain, and not without reason, of the intimate footing on which I lived with this nobleman for many years; and, until the day of his death, I possessed both his friendship and confidence, which my old friend, George Fitzroy, the present Earl, well knows. He was then General Fitzroy, and had served in the seven years war in Germany, under the orders of Prince Ferdinand, during which time he had contracted a great intimacy with General Schliefen, who then was minister to his Serene Highness the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel. His Highness was graciously pleased, from the application of General Schliefen, to appoint me a Captain in the Hessian Jager corps. At my particular request, General Fitzroy kept my application a profound secret; for I was determined not to continue in the British service; though, had my intentions been known, some persons, perhaps, might have had sufficient influence on me to have deterred me from my project.

 Prince

In my way down to Andover in Hampshire, where I kept my hunters, I called on my old and intimate friend, Lord Spencer Hamilton, and imparted to him what I had done, in confidence of his secrecy. I kept this design of mine so profound a secret, that it was not in the least known or suspected, till one day, after hunting, while I was at dinner with my friend Lord Egmont, and some other gentlemen, at the Castle Inn, Marlborough, the waiter informed me that an express was arrived to me from the Hessian minister. After reading the contents, that he had received a dispatch from Hesse Cassel, in which his Serene Highness the Landgrave had appointed me a captain in his corps of Jagers, and had sent my commission to him, I threw the letter on the table for the company to peruse, which they did with the utmost astonishment. I set off for London the next day, and ordered all my horses to town to be sold at my old friend Tattersall's, of whose regard for me I shall have occasion to speak more fully in another part of this Work. By this time I had contracted a mortgage on my estate of thirteen thousand pounds, and had been for some time resolved to sell it, and take a general review of my affairs, with which I had been for a long time but little acquainted; constantly raising money from time to time as I wanted it. Preparatory to a sale, I had employed a person, with my steward, to survey the estate.

About this time, being in company with Mr. Wyatt, the great land-surveyor, with whom I was on terms of the greatest intimacy, he said to me, "George Hanger, you have had your estate surveyed, and, as I am informed, intend to sell it: I have been in your neighbourhood lately, and know, I believe, rather more of your estate than you do yourself." To which I readily assented, or he must have known very little of it indeed. "Then," continued he, "as I have a regard for you, I request, if you have any faith in my knowledge of estates, that you will put it into my hands to dispose of it,—but upon one condition, to which you must, before this company, pledge me your honour."—I knew my man; and therefore, on my honour, I promised to assent to whatever he had to promise. "I have," continued he, "a very good estate of my own, and, besides, I am paid very liberally by several noblemen and gentlemen for the management of their estates, and do not want to take any money of you: you must, therefore, faithfully promise me, that you will never request my acceptance of one farthing for my trouble: my expences I will charge you, and nothing more, as my design and wish is to serve you as a friend." Such was the generous and noble manner in which my friend Wyatt acted by me. "Your estate," said he, "is very valuable; far more so than you imagine. I have been acquainted with all the particulars of it by a skilful man, a surveyor, who lives near you, who advised me to buy it; but I have just bought an estate, or I would have purchased it: but that is out of the question, as I have no more money."

I thought myself inexpressibly fortunate to have met with a man of such known integrity, who came forward as a friend to serve me; and rejoiced in leaving my affairs, on my departure for America, in the hands of so honest and able a man: but, alas! cruel fate, which has destined me to suffer misfortunes and misery in various shapes, had decreed it otherwise, by the sudden death of my friend a short time after I had left my native shores. This melancholy and unfortunate event proved my ruin; the particulars of which I shall relate in their proper place.

Mr. Wyatt passed several days with me and my steward, in surveying the estate before my departure, when I gave him the fullest warrant of attorney that could be made by law, to sign, seal, sell, &c. &c. &c. and was happy in so doing. After Mr. Wyatt had completed the survey, and made his calculation on the estate, I asked him if he had formed a sufficient judgment of it to tell me nearly what it was worth? He replied, "It is honestly worth twenty-four thousand pounds: and, I give you my honour, that if I had not lately bought an estate, I would myself give you that sum for it." I shall now, for a time, drop the subject of my estate; but I judged it necessary to mention the value at which he estimated it, on account of the sum for which it was sold some time afterwards.

I now returned to London, and was presented at Court as a Hessian officer, by my friend Baron Kutzleben, the Hessian minister. This took place early in January, and I sailed the fifteenth day of the ensuing March from Portsmouth for America.

I should be guilty of ingratitude if I did not acknowledge the singular kindness which Lord North shewed me when I first resolved on quitting the British service. I had the honour of being as well acquainted with him as his high rank as minister of the country, and my inferior situation, could admit; for I was accustomed to meet him oftentimes in many of the first and gayest circles in London: for this able statesman, the best of private characters, the most pleasant, engaging, and amiable of mankind, did not bury himself in the inaccessible retreats of Downing-street; but, when affairs of state did not require his attention, relaxed himself in the fashionable assemblies, which he never failed to enliven by that incomparable flow of wit and good humour which he possessed.

It was absolutely necessary that I should, if not recommended by the minister, have his permission; or at least that he should acknowledge me as an officer and a gentleman. On my relating to this liberal and friendly nobleman how I had been treated, and merely requesting him to recommend me as a gentleman to the Hessian minister, he replied, "My dear Mr. Hanger, however displeased you may be, from the history you have related to me, surely you do not prefer any foreign service to your own; and there will be several new regiments raised, in which you, from your situation *, are entitled to serve, with an advanced rank." —"My Lord, I understand your meaning, and return you my most sincere thanks for your kind intention; and I assure you, on my honour, I shall be as grateful for your intended goodness as if I accepted it:

it: but I find myself so vexed, grieved, and injured, that nothing on earth can make me remain in the British army." He then said, "I am sorry you are so determined, Mr. Hanger; but if you will bring the Hessian minister to me any morning, I will give orders that you shall be admitted, and will say any thing you shall please to the Hessian minister." "My Lord, I most gratefully acknowledge my obligations to you: I wish you only to recommend me to his Serene Highness the Landgrave's protection." —"It shall be done, Sir:"—and of course it was, and in the most friendly and handsome manner.

To young officers, who may read these pages, take warning from what I have suffered by not accepting of this kind offer, and in being too hasty and violent in quitting the guards. It is of little avail for those who have no power to kick against the pricks: you will only wound your own heel.

It is necessary, before I step on ship-board for America, that I should mention, on account of the ruin which soon afterwards overtook me, that I went to every public place in London, for near three months, and dressed in my foreign uniform. My departure for the war was known to the whole town; and it may surely be believed that those to whom I was indebted would not have permitted me to depart without paying them, or finding them security:—In short, I did give them the most satisfactory security; for I gave them my own, confirmed by that of Mr. Wyatt.

A New Species of Swindling

HAS lately been discovered, and followed with considerable success by an adventurous youth, who seems to disregard the old-fashioned maxims of meum et tuum; and, in the fullest acceptation of the expression, to live by his wits. It must be in the recollection of the public, that some time since depredations were committed by a young man in the vicinity of Richmond, Twickenham, and the surrounding villages, who entered every house he found open, and, if unseen, carried off whatever valuables were within his reach: but, if questioned, produced some trinkets, of which he pretended he wished to dispose. This mode of levying contributions on the property of his neighbours, he has recently discontinued; but not being desirous of living in idleness, the enterprising youth has turned his thoughts to a new way of procuring an honest subsistence, and commenced his experiments in the following manner: It appears that a young man dressed in a blue coat, and nankeen pantaloons, entered the Gloucester Coffee House, in Piccadilly, and called for some refreshment, &c.—His appetite being satisfied, there only remained the trifling circumstance of discharging the bill, but when it was brought he confessed to the waiter he had no money. What was to be done? After much argument, pro. and con. he at last produced a ring, which he had the address to persuade the waiter was not only fully adequate to the amount of the demand, but worth an additional half-guinea, which he accordingly condescended to borrow, leaving the ring in pledge. Wearied with the exertions of the day, he went to bed; but being of an active disposition, and by no means liking to pass over the night in idleness, he rose about three in the morning, and prepared for a foraging expedition. Having tried several chamber-doors, and among others that where the master of the house slept, without effect, he at last found a room-door open, and a brace of Abigails fast asleep. Their pockets he soon rifled; but scorning to play the treacherous part of Tarquin, he left these sleeping Lucretias to the undisturbed enjoyment of their repose; and, pursuing his rout, entered another chamber inhabited by a gentleman, who was also fast locked in the embraces of Somnus. Scarcely daring to breathe, through fear and expectation, he approached the bed; but just at the critical moment he was preparing to make a quick transfer of all the property he could find, the gentleman awoke! and uttering an exclamation, put our adventurer to flight. Having sufficiently reconnoitered the premises, and finding himself likely to be unearthed, he very gallantly made a burst, and ran to cover, at Hatchett's Hotel, the doors of which, from the number of gentlemen who sleep there, and coaches departing at different periods, are open at all hours for the accommodation of the Public. He engaged a bed, and not terrified by his recent narrow escape, renewed his attempts in a similar manner.—It is sufficient to observe, that his gleanings produced, independent of the Gloucester Coffee-house, one pound four shillings taken from a footman, which Mr. Hatchett has repaid, a parcel of gloves, a black silk cloak, and a new waistcoat. About six o'clock he retired with his "Opima Spolia;" and, if not speedily detected, we have no doubt but we shall soon have to record other striking specimens of his ingenuity.

ACTIVITY AND GAIETY OF A FRENCH BISHOP.

THE good and ingenuous Huet recollected in his old age the loves and gallantries of his youth, with a mingled penitence and self-complacency, the expression of which is not unamusing:—"I went too much," says he, "into the gay company of men, and much more into that of women; thinking that, to obtain a character for politeness, it was necessary to please the fair sex. I omitted none of those attentions by which it is supposed that their favour is to be won. I kept my person fresh and neat, wore rich and fashionable clothes, was indefatigable in my assiduities towards those whom I admired, often addressed them in amatory verses, and whispered many a tender thing in their ears. One copy of love-verses which I then wrote is now universally read, and is not over delicate."—How admirably the character of the old Frenchman here breaks out. From an old officer this would have been nothing surprising. Being from an aged bishop, it bespeaks in him a lightness of spirit, not naturally allied to episcopal gravity.

The following is also an ingenious display of French vanity by the same worthy Huet:—"I was," says he, "an indifferent dancer, indeed; but then I excelled all my young companions in fencing and riding; I could leap over any height to which I was able to reach my hands; I outstripped every one in running; and I could grasp a staff so firmly, that not any two of the strongest men could wrest it from my hands. I was a very skilful swimmer: and I knew how to dive for shell fish to the bottom of the deepest creek or river."

COURSING.

SNOWBALL, the property of Major Topham, of Wold Cottage, Yorkshire, and who was supposed posed to be (taken for every thing) the best Greyhound that ever was, won Four Silver Cups, and above Thirty Matches. Snowball does not run any more.

Major, the brother of Snowball, (given by Major Topham, to Colonel Thornton, of Thornville Royal,) is imagined to be the best running dog now in England. He beat the famous bitch, Dent, who was sold for Thirty Guineas. It has been proposed to run the three Sister-Dents against all England, for Five Hundred Guineas, the offer being confined to three of the same litter.

The Rev. Mr. Dudley's bitch, Miss, of Bradwell Hall, in the county of Essex, is much spoken of. She won the Cup at the Tillingham Marsh Meeting, in March last.

A new Coursing Meeting has been established by Captain Wellwood, at Kinross, in Scotland. His Black bitch, Splent, and black and white dog, Spring, won the two last Silver Cups, value sixteen guineas each, and a purse in addition. Spring was the dog that was brought two years ago from Scotland, to run Snowball, at the Malton Meeting, and who was beat by Snowball. Capt. Wellwood is said to be remarkable in the feeding and training his greyhounds, which he does not trust to any one but himself.

The greatest match now depending, is between a young dog, called Suwarrow, got by Snowball, and Mr. Darley's famous bitch, Dent, over Flixton Wolds, the 24th of November next. Indeed, such is the fame of the Flixton Wolds, for coursing, that Mr. Swinfen, the great Derbyshire breeder of greyhounds, has made, as we understand, three matches, to be also run there in November next.

The greatest Greyhound Breeders that we at present know of, are Marquis Townshend and Mr. Hammond—Norfolk.

Mr. Mundy—Derbyshire.
Captain Swinfen—Derbyshire.
Mr. Stead—Berkshire.
The Rev. Mr. Corsellis and Mr. B. Dudley—Essex.
Doctor Frampton—Newmarket.
Mr. Clarke (who was the possessor of Schoolboy)—Vauxhall.
Colonel Thornton, Thornville Royal—Yorkshire.
Sir Rowland Winn, Nostal Park—Ditto.
Major Topham, Wold Cottage—Ditto.
Mr. Plumer, Bilton Hall—Ditto.
Captain Wellwood, Pitliver—Scotland.

We understand, Mr. Clarke's Schoolboy was supposed to have been the fleetest greyhound of his day: but the Newmarket hares which chiefly come from Cheveley Park, are so inferior to the hares at Flixton, that the best trials ever given to Schoolboy, could not have been equal to the common trials which Snowball had in his time; besides, in point of breed, there was no comparison; as Schoolboy was a large coarse dog, and wire-haired; whereas, Snowball, in fineness of skin, and symmetry of make, exhibited every sign of the highest blood possible.

Poetical Sale of Epithets.

To the Editors of the Sporting Magazine.

Gentlemen,

When I inform you that I was a chief partner in the poetical firm of Della Crusca, Anna Matilda, and that brilliant phalanx of poets, who illustrated the World some time ago, you will probably recollect having read many of my most astonishing and super-excellent performances. Evil days, however, ever, have at length come upon us; we have been partly laughed out of notice, and some of us have, by dint of perseverance, fairly written our school down. You will probably recollect, gentlemen, that the basis of our poetry was epithet—none of our substantives were allowed to stand by themselves, but were gravely accompanied by a weighty adjective, as you may sometimes see a tiny Miss followed in her shopping excursions by a tall footman. Of these epithets I have yet left a large collection, which I am disposed to Sell by Auction, either together, or, what perhaps would be preferable, in small lots, for the accommodation of families and individuals. I can assure you that, although they have often been used, they are as good as new; and, I will venture to say, will appear to as much advantage twenty years hence as they do now. Although our school may be at present under a cloud, it is probable it may revive at some future period, and our language be again involved in all the charming obscurity of sentimental expletives and epithets. In the mean time I send you my Catalogue, and you may print them in the usual letter; although, when we print them in our poems, we generally use small and great capitals, italics, and !!! plenty of notes of admiration !!!

Bird Hunting in Norway.

Extraordinary and perilous Manner of hunting Birds, in Norway, from Pentoppidan's Natural History.

At Faeroa, which exports annually several thousand pounds worth of feathers to Copenhagen, there is held a bird-hunt of his kind, which is circumstantially described by Mr. Lucas Debes, who was many years a Dean in that country.

It is not to be described, he says, with what trouble and danger they look for the birds in the high and steep rocks, many of which are more than two hundred fathoms perpendicular, and there are particular people, who, by nature, are fitted for this kind of bird-catching, and are called bird-men. They make use of two methods to catch them; they either climb up these perpendicular rocks, or else are let down from the top by a strong and thick rope: when they climb up they have a large pole, of eleven or twelve ells in length, with an iron hook at the end: they who are underneath in the boat, or stand on a cliff, fasten this hook to the waistband of the man's breeches who climbs, and a rope round his waist; by which means they help him up to the highest helde or projection, that he can reach, and fix his feet upon; then they help another up to the same place; and when they are both up, then they give them each their bird-pole in their hands, and a long rope tied round each others waist at each end; then the one climbs up as high as he can, and where it is difficult, the other by putting his pole under his breech, pushes him up, till he gets to a good helde, or standing place: the uppermost of the two then helps the other up to him with the rope, and so on till they get to the place where the birds build, and there search about after them as they please. As there are in these rocks many dangerous places they are yet to climb, whilst they are bound together with a strong rope, one always seeks a convenient place to stand sure, and be able to hold himself fast, whilst the other is climbing about. If the latter should happen to slip, then he is held up by the other, who stands firm, and helps him up again; and when he has got safe by those dangerous places, then he fixes himself in the same manner, that he may assist the other to come safe to him; and then they clamber about after birds where they please. But accidents accidents sometimes happen; for if one does not stand firm, or is not strong enough to support the other when he slips, they both fall, and are killed; and this way there are some every year destroyed.

Mr. Peder Clauson, in his description of Norway, writes, that in former times there was a law in the country, that when any one by climbing the rocks, fell and was killed, and his body was found, that then his nearest relation should go the same way; if he could not, or would not venture, then the deceased was not allowed a christian burial, but treated as a criminal, who had by that means, been his own executioner; but that law is not in force now-a-days.

When they in that manner already related, get up the rocks to the birds, in those places where they seldom come, the birds are so tame that they may take them up with their hands; for they do not readily leave their young; but where they are wild, there they either throw a net over them in the rocks; or else those that are flying away, or come flying in again, they throw their poles against with a net on them, and so entangle them in it. This way they catch vast numbers of the Lumvifer, Alliker, and Lunder. In the mean time there is a boat lying underneath on the sea, into which they throw their dead fowl, and so quickly fill the vessel. When the weather is tolerably good, and there is a good deal of game, the bird-men will lie eight days together in the rocks; for there are here and there holes that they can safely and securely rest in; and provision is let down to them by lines, and others go every day to them with little boats, to fetch what they catch.

Many rocks are so frightful and dangerous that they cannot possibly climb up them; for which reason, they continue to get down from above, which they call to sie; this is the second way of searching for birds, and is done thus: they have a strong rock line, or rope, eighty or a hundred fathoms long, and about three inches in thickness; one end of this the bird-man fastens about his waist in the place of a belt, and then he draws it betwixt his legs, so that he can sit on it, and so he is let down with his bird-pole in his hand: six men at top hold the rope, letting it sink by degrees, but lay a piece of timber on the edge of the rock for it to slide on, that it should not be torn to pieces on the sharp edges of the stones: they have another line fastened round the man's waist, which he pulls to give signs when he would be pulled up, or let lower, or held still, that he may remain on the place he is come to. This way the man is in great danger from the stones loosening by the rope, and so falling, which he cannot keep off; for this reason, he generally has on a sailor's blue furred cap, which is thick, and well lined, and in some measure saves the blows the stones may give, if they are not too large; otherwise it often costs him his life. Thus they often expose themselves to the most imminent danger, merely to get a subsistence for their poor families, trusting in God's mercy and protection, to which the greatest part of them seriously recommend themselves before they undertake the dangerous work. There are some, indeed, who say there is no great danger in it, excepting that when they have not learnt the practice, or are not accustomed to it, the rope runs round about with them, till their heads are turned, and they can do nothing to save themselves; it is in itself troublesome, and requires dexterity; yet those that have learned it make play of it, for they know easily how to swing themselves on the line: they know how to put their feet against the rocks, and throw themselves several fathom out, and push themselves in again to what place they will; and when the birds sit, they know artfully how to keep themselves fast on the line in the air, and to keep the pole in their hands, and with it to catch numbers flying out and coming in; and where there are holes in rocks, and where the rocks project over like a cover, in which places the birds gather. Here they will continue (and this is the greatest art) to throw themselves out, and quickly to fling themselves in again, under the cover, to the birds, and there to fix their feet. When one of them gets into these holes he loosens himself from the rope, which he fastens to a stone, to prevent its falling out of his reach, and then he climbs about, and catches the birds, either with his hands, or with the pole, in the same manner as was said before; and when he has killed as many as he thinks enough, he ties them together, and fastens them to the small line, and by a pull gives a sign for those above to draw them up. In this manner he works all day, and when he wants to go up he gives a sign to be drawn up, or else he works himself up with his belt full of birds.

Where it happens that there are not people enough to hold the large rope, then the bird-men fixes a post in the ground, and fastens his rope to it, and so slides down, without any help, to work in the aforesaid manner. Some rocks are so formed, that one may go down into them from the fields; then they take a companion with them, and go in after the former manner, searching about in the holes, and take each as many as their belt will hold about their waist, or as they can carry in a bundle on their backs; and so they carry them home. There are also in some places, vast deep cliffs, lying under the land, and yet more than one hundred fathoms above the water, which are also very difficult to get at. Down these cliffs they help one another in the manner aforesaid, and they take a strong rope with them, which they fasten here and there in the cliff, where they can, and leave it all the summer; upon this they will run up and down, and take the birds at their pleasure. It is not to be described how frightful and dangerous this bird-catching appears to the beholders, particularly to consider the vast height, and how excessive steep these rocks are, and many projecting over the sea. It appears impossible for any human creature to get into the holes of them, and yet more impossible to climb up them; and yet these adventurous people scale them. They go sometimes where they can but just pitch the ends of their toes, or lay hold with their fingers; yet this does not frighten them, though these is one hundred fathom down, or more to the sea under them. This must be dear-earned bread for these poor people, for which they so imminently hazard their lives, and many, after long practice, still fall a sacrifice themselves.

When these birds are brought home, they eat part of them fresh, and part (if they get large quantities) is hung up to dry for the winter season. The feathers they collect together, and make merchandize of them, to great advantage; and the inhabitants get them in such quantities as God pleases to give his blessing to, and seasonable weather for it. The birds do not come every where in this country, but on those islands that are in towards the ocean, and have high rocks or cliffs as at Norder-Oerne, Myggenas, Vaagoe, Skuoe, Dimerne, and Suderoe; and in dark weather they generally get most, for then the birds stay in the rocks; in fine, clear, and hot sunshiny days, they are mostly out at sea; and towards the time of their going away, they keep towards the sea, and sit on the cliffs by the sea side, and then the people go in boats, and catch them with their poles and nets.

The inhabitants of St. Kilda, on the coast of Scotland, practice nearly the same hazardous method of getting sea-birds and their eggs.

Anecdotes of the late Dr. Monsey.

MESSENGER Monsey was born in the year 1693, at a remote village in Norfolk, of which his father was Rector; but at the revolution, by declining the oaths, forfeited his preferment. In one respect he was happier than the generality of nonjuring clergymen, as he had some resource in a paternal estate, which is still in the family, and preserved him from those difficulties which too many at that time encountered, who sacrificed interest to principle.

He received a good classical education, which the old gentleman superintended chiefly himself, and was removed to St. Mary Hall, Cambridge; and, after five years spent at the University, studied physic some time under Sir Benjamin Wrench, at Norwich, from which place he went and settled as a Physician at Bury.

He here experienced the common fate of country physicians—constant fatigue, long journies, and an inadequate income.—The writer of this sketch has heard him confess, that, after every exertion of unwearied application and fair fame, his receipts never exceeded three hundred pounds a year, by efforts which, in an easy chariot, and in the streets of London, secure Dr. Warren nearly twenty times the income.

With a rusty wig, dirty boots, and leather breeches, he here might have degenerated into the humdrum country doctor, with the common-place questions by rote, the tongue, the pulse, and the guinea; his merits not diffused beyond a county chronicle, and his fame confined to a country church yard.

Lord Godolphin, the son of Queen Anne's Lord Treasurer, and a daughter of John, the great Duke of Marlborough, was seized with an apoplectic complaint on his journey to his seat near Newmarket: the nearest medical help was at Bury, and nature, or Dr. Monsey, were so successful, as to secure Lord Godolphin's life, and his warmest gratitude.

A sick room, and at a distance from polished society, was a dreary prospect, and pain was aggravated by the fear of solitude; so circumstanced, how happy to meet relief, and to find it accompanied with frank chearfulness, literary talents, and convivial wit.

Lord Godolphin was single, not a very young man, nor much given to company or dissipation, and he felt an impulse, that attaching himself to worth so superior to the situation in which he found it, would afford him a rational companion in his leisure hours, and a medical friend, so desirable in the decline of life.

During the intervals of illness, his esteem for the Doctor increased; and, after his Lordship's recovery, his behaviour was so unassuming, and his offers so liberal, that he accompanied companied his patron to the metropolis.

Nor can a greater contrast of life be imagined; by one of those turns of fortune, by so many neglected, but which are said to occur to all, from the narrow rural circuit, from the justice, the curate, the lawyer, and the apothecary, he was deposited in the metropolis, the region of elegance, the fountain of politics, and the land of promise.

Nor did he meet with that delayed hope which is said to make the heart sick; for he was treated at Lord Godolphin's as a friend and a companion, introduced to many of the first characters of the age for rank and eminence: among others, Sir Robert Walpole assiduously cultivated his acquaintance, and the late Earl of Chesterfield, always acknowledged, with gratitude, the benefit he derived from his medical assistance.

He thus trod the pleasantest path of life, the midway between leisure and fatigue, while friendship, polished society, and literary amusement, might be said to strew it with flowers.

He was made a Fellow of the Royal Society, though his great age for many years past prevented his attendance; and on the death of Dr. Smart, Physician to Chelsea College, he was appointed to succeed him.

Although Lord Godolphin readily embraced every opportunity to forward the interest of his friend Monsey, as he used to call him, yet he could not persuade himself to lose his society, which he was frequently heard to declare was the solace and comfort of his life.

And on the Doctor's appointment to Chelsea, he procured leave for him still to reside in town, on condition of his visiting the Hospital as occasion might require.

He was once in habits of the closest intimacy with the late David Garrick, whose fascinating powers of conversation and elegant manners, were very opposite to Dr. Monsey's; who, during a long intercourse with the great and the gay, ever preserved a plainness of behaviour, but, to those who remember it, by no means an unpleasing one.

Nor could he ever be persuaded to sacrifice sincerity on the shrine of abject flattery: he spoke the truth; and, what sometimes gave offence, the whole truth, which afforded occasion to ignorance and malignity to cry him down as a cynic; but it should be remembered, that his censure, though severe, was generally just, and that his shafts were directed against vice, folly, and affectation.

This difference of manners between him and the Manager, produced a mutual, but not unfriendly, exchange of raillery. To raise a laugh at the Doctor's expence was the amusement of many an hour at Hampton.

Garrick told him one evening, after his return from performing at Drury Lane, that he wished to see a favourite scene acted by a performer at Covent Garden, then much in fashion; that he had slipped from his own stage slily, and trusted an underling actor, known by the name of Dagger Marr *, to supply for a few minutes his place, which was only to stand silent and aloof, and that he returned time enough to take his place before it was his turn to speak. The Doctor credulously swallowed the story, circulated it with a degree of serious wonder; the town enjoyed the joke, and he was heartily laughed at for his pains.

Those who knew Mr. Garrick

* Not Jefferson, as Messrs. Este and Topham, who are very correct, relate it.

admired

admired and loved him; but they knew, and universally confessed, that though he eagerly sought and enjoyed a joke at another man's expence, he was nettled if it was raised at his own. Monsey frequently retorted with success.* The little Manager was sore, and lapsed, on a particular occasion, into an unjustifiable asperity of reply, that called forth the latent spark of resentment in his friend.

The Bishop of Sodor and Man (if I mistake not, Dr. Hildesley, who preceded Dr. Wilson) was saying, that Garrick certainly meant to quit the stage. "He never will do it," said Monsey, "as long as he knows a guinea is cross on one side, and pile on the other."*—This was industriously reported. The violence with which it was resented, proved that it was true; and the long acquaintance was closed by an anonymous letter sent by Garrick, containing the frequently-quoted extract from Horace, a sentiment which Roscius ought to have been the last man to quote, as the eccentric oddities of his friend, as he used to call them, afforded him a constant food, at all times, and in all places, for ridiculous anecdote.

Absentem qui rodit amicum, &c. &c.

Intimate friends are said to make the most inveterate enemies; and Garrick, by his repeated and widely diffused sarcasms, certainly embittered the enmity.

Severe recrimination, fomented by the interference of officious meddlers, who enjoyed their quarrel, subsisted to the last.

I had an imperfect sight of some unfinished stanzas penned by the Doctor, during the Manager's illness, on which occasioned many physicians had been called in.

As soon as Garrick died, which Monsey did not expect, they were instantly destroyed, and I never could prevail on him to repeat them.

As they have not been published, if my memory will assist me, I shall endeavour to recollect a part of them: they prove how strongly,

Hæsit lateri lethalis arundo.

Seven wise physicians lately met,
To save a wretched sinner;
Come, Tom, says Jack, pray let's be quick,
Or I shall lose my dinner.

The consultation then begins, and the case of the patient is stated; after which,

Some roar'd for rhubarb, jalap some,
And some cry'd out for Dover;
Let's give him something, each man said—
Why e'en let's give him—over.

This desperate counsel is, however, rejected by one of the medical sages, who, after some reflections on the life and habits of the patient, declares that he has great confidence in chink; adding,

Not dry'd up skinks, you ninnies;
The chinking that I recommend
'S the famous chink of guineas!

A humorous altercation ensues to determine by whom this auricular application of the purse should be made; with a humility and politeness to each other, for which physicians are so remarkable, each declines the honour to the superior rank or years of his neighbour. But the poet shrewdly guesses that this backwardness arose from the majority of them not choosing to exhibit the comfortless state of their pockets.

At last a physician in vogue prides himself on his purse replenished with guineas, which he had weighed, found heavy, and not returned,

* A proverbial expression in Norfolk.

turned to his patients as light: in the moment of exultation he exclaims,

> I and my long tails seldom fail
> To earn a score a day.

After due solemnity he approaches the bed side; the curtain is withdrawn, and the glittering gold shaken at the sick man's ear.

> Soon as the fav'rite sound he heard,
> One faint effort he try'd;
> He op'd his eyes, he stretch'd his hand,
> He made one grasp, and dy'd.

Lord Bath vainly attempted to reconcile them:—"I thank you," cried Dr. Monsey, "but why will your Lordship trouble yourself with the squabbles of a Merry Andrew and a Quack Doctor?"

But the time was approaching when he was to lose his friend, benefactor, and patron, Lord Godolphin, who frequently, by his recommendation, and often by his joint assistance, raised depressed merit, and relieved obscure indigence—a trait in his Lordship's character which a love of ease would have suppressed, had not Monsey frequently called it forth.

After a life spent more in snug comfort than brilliancy, this nobleman died at a good old age, bequeathing the Doctor a handsome legacy. His enjoyments were of the retired domestic kind, his game back-gammon, and his favourite book Cibber's Apology for his own Life.

His Lordship used to relate a conversation that passed between Lady Sunderland and his grandmother, which proves the old Duchess of Marlborough was not entirely such a woman as the malignancy of Pope describes, though she gave him a thousand pounds to suppress the portrait of Atossa, which a Bishop took care to add, by Pope's desire, in the posthumous edition.

"Amongst the torrent of abuse poured out on your Grace," said Lady Sunderland, "your worst enemies have never called you a faithless wife."—"It was no great merit," said old Sarah, the first Duchess of Marlborough, as she was turning over the papers afterwards sent to Mallock for her husband's history: "it was no great merit; for I had the handsomest, the most accomplished, and bravest man in Europe for my husband."—"Yet you don't pretend to say he was without faults," replied Lady Sunderland.—"By no means; I knew them better than he did himself, or even than I do my own. He came back one day from my poor misled mistress, Queen Anne, I believe when he resigned his commission, and said he had told her, that he thanked God, with all his faults, neither avarice or ambition could be laid to his charge." Such was the sensible answer of Sarah: to which she added, "I was not then in a laughing humour, but, at my Lord's words, I almost bit through my tongue to prevent my smiling in his face."

Anecdote of Rosamond's Pond.

YOU must know, says a Turkish writer of the last century, that the English die by their own hands, with as much indifference as by another's; suicide being more common here, than in any other part of the habitable world. In the eleventh moon of the year, they generally begin to hang, stab, shoot, and drown away, as though Lucifer were in them. 'Tis common to hear people talk of men and women that make away with themselves, as they call it, and generally for reasons that would appear to us but as trifles: the men, perhaps, for the cruelty cruelty or inconstancy of their mistresses, and the women for the indifferency of the men. In the twelve moons we resided among them, we heard of above three hundred young men and maids, that drowned themselves for some uneasiness in their amours. They have a small canal, called Rosamond's Pond, which is appropriated only for the use of such as fall for love, and it is incredible to think what vast numbers of both sexes, under this circumstance, have destroyed themselves in it. An Irish fortune-hunter, that had met with but indifferent usage from the ladies, came hither one morning to take a bon-repos, but to his great disappointment found the canal frozen over; so that the poor gentleman was forced to return home to his garret, and have recourse to his garters.

For the SPORTING MAGAZINE.

THE LONDON SPORTSMEN; OR, THE COCKNEY'S JOURNEY.

SEPTEMBER 1.—According to our agreement, made at the Hole-in-the-Wall, six of us met on Blackfriar's Bridge, at half past five o'clock, armed, and furnished with a large quantity of ammunition.

Squibbed our guns over the bridge, and got a volley of oaths from a West Country bargeman that was passing under the centre arch.

Loaded and primed—gave the dogs a piece of bread each—the fox dog would not eat his—took a dram a-piece, and set forward in high spirits for the Circus gate, on our way to Camberwell, where we were informed we should find several covies.

Just at Christ Church, Blackfriars Road, Ned Simple shot at a rat and missed it; but it gave us a fine hunt, the dogs barking all the way, until we drove it into the Thames.

Beat over all the ground about the Halfpenny Hatches, and found nothing but one cat, which all of us fired at; but being only six in number, and a cat having nine lives, we missed killing, though we severely wounded her.

Passing at the back of Webber Row, we saw several pigeons, but though they were within pistol shot, they flew so fast that none of us could take aim, although our guns were ready cocked, and loaded with No. 2, six fingers deep.

Saw five sparrows on the ground, opposite the Elephant and Castle, Newington, feasting on some new-dropped horse-dung—stole up with great caution within four yards of the game, and gave an irregular fire; but Bob Tape's musquet going off before he took aim, the birds, we suppose, made their escape antecedent to the other five going off, for the devil of a sparrow we killed.

Rather out of humour with such ill-luck—so took another dram a-piece, and pushed briskly forward for Camberwell.

Met two men driving geese at Kennington Common—offered them eighteen-pence, which they accepted, for a shot at the flock at twenty yards. Drew lots who should fire first. It fell to Billy Candlewick's chance, who, from his father belonging many years ago to the Orange Regiment of City Militia knew something of taking aim.

The goose-driver stepped the ground, and Billy took aim for above ten minutes, when, shutting both his eyes, lest the pan might flash in his sight, he snapped and missed fire—he took aim a second time—snapped and missed again—borrowed Bob Tape's scissars, and hammered hammered the flint—snapped and missed fire a third time—thought the devil had got hold of the gun—examined her—found she was neither loaded nor primed. The goose-driver refused to let Billy try again, so we gave him another sixpence, and he sold us a lame gander, which we placed about six yards, and taking a shot a-piece at him, killed him, and put him in Ned Thimble's cabbage net.

When we came in sight of the Swan, at Stockwell, we all run as hard as we could to see who should get in first, as we had settled to breakfast there. Unfortunately our guns being cocked, I made a stumble, and the trigger being touched by something, off went the piece, and lodged the contents in the body of a sucking pig that was crossing the road. The squeaking of the poor animal roused the maternal affections of the sow, and set the fox dog, the terrier, the Newfoundland bitch, and the mastiff, a barking. The noise of the sow, the pig, and the dogs, with the report of the gun, brought the people of the house, and indeed of the neighbourhood; and being threatened by one, and laughed at by another, we thought it best to buy the pig at four shillings, which we did; and, having put it into Bob Tape's game bag, which, by the bye, was nothing but half a bolster tick, we made the best of our way to the Plough, at Clapham, where we had some cold buttock and ale for breakfast.

Tried all the Common round—beat every bush with the muzzle of our guns—set the dogs on the pigs—and found but one chaffinch which was rather wild, not letting us come within eight yards, so that we could not make sure of our bird—we hunted him from spray to spray for above an hour, without being able to come in a parallel line, so as to take sure aim, when, at last, he was killed by a little boy, who knocked him down with a stone—bought him, and put him into the net with the goose.

Resolved to make for Blackheath, and so cut across the country that we might get into the stubbles—missed our road, and by some kind of circumbendibus, got into Brixton Causeway, where we asked if there were any birds in the neighbourhood. We were directed to a dead horse, were two ravens and several magpies were assembled, but they would not stay our arrival; for the moment they saw us they made off.

Our pig-carrying companion, and our goose-carrier, complained of the weight—so we took charge of the game by turns.

Hunted a weazel for above an hour, and lost him—the terrier was remarkably staunch.

Crossing a field near Camberwell, we thought we saw a covey of partridges at the side of a ditch—so we all made up to them with our guns cocked, tying the dogs to our legs, that they might not run in and spring the game.

What we thought to be a covey of partridges, proved to be a gang of gypsies, who were squatted under the hedge, peeling turnips, and preparing potatoes for dinner. It was the mercy of God we did not fire upon them, as all our pieces were up to our shoulders, and we had but one eye a-piece open; when that which we took to be the old cock, rose up, and said, in a loud voice—"What the devil are ye about?"

After many difficulties, and but little sport, got, by the direction of the gypsies, into the Greenwich Road; where, being rather fatigued, we stopped at the Halfway House, until a coach came by; when, mounting the roof and the box, we were conveyed near Blackheath

Blackheath, to our unspeakable joy.

Never saw the Heath before—amazed at the number of furze bushes, and the wide extent there is for game—had an excellent chase after a jack-ass, which the mastiff tore in the leg—kept close together for fear of losing each other.

Got down near a large house—shot at a flock of sparrows, and killed one, which we think is a cock, his head being rather black.

Saw several brother sportsmen out, who had killed nothing but a hedge-hog, and a tame jack-daw, which belonged to a public-house at New-cross-turnpike.

Got up to the main road—fired at a yellow-hammer, and frightened the horses in the Dover stage—the guard threatening to shoot us, we took to our heels.

Saw some black game flying very high—they looked for all the world like crows.

The terrier came to a point at a thick bunch of fern—we were now sure this must be a covey of partridges, and we prepared accordingly—the mastiff ran in, brought out one of the young ones—it proved to be a nest of field-mice—took every one and put them into the bolster—grass-mice were better than nothing.

Much fatigued, and agreed to shoot all the way home—fired off our guns at the foot of Greenwich-hill, and were laughed at by the inhabitants—loaded them again, and fired at a sheet of paper for half an hour, without putting a grain in it—got to Smith's at dusk, and discharged our pieces in the air before we went in—had something to eat and drink—then set off for the city—and squibbed all the way as long as the powder lasted.

Got home much fatigued with the day's sport, and told a thousand lies about the birds we killed, and the presents we made of them—smoaked our pipes—and by twelve got to bed.

Humourous Sketch of English Diversions, in 1739.

Among all the amusements invented by the idle part of them to pass away their time, there is not one which is attended with so many evil consequences as that of gaming, nor indeed any so much below the dignity of human nature; a vice altogether unknown to Mussulmans, it being an employment so trifling in appearance, that a man with a box and dice is hardly distinguishable from a child with its rattle. Not long since they had a Minister from Spain, who brought gaming into great reputation on their sabbath day; then was it common to see gentlemen and ladies blaspheming, cursing, swearing, duelling, running of heads against the wall, throwing of hats and wigs into the fire, distortions of the countenance, biting of nails, burning of cards, breaking of dice-boxes, &c. Indeed it would not be amiss, if husbands should make use of their authority, at least to regulate one circumstance; that is, to bring their wives to be content with two hours play, instead of twelve, in the four-and-twenty, because some inconveniences attend it; the servants having all that time to themselves to intrigue, to junket, to filch and steal, to pawn the inferior moveables, and, lastly, to corrupt the children, by teaching them cursing, swearing, lying, and lewdness. But should a husband of quality, attempt such a reformation in his family, all the female relations on the woman's side, would be upbraiding him with the epithets of Turk, monster, barbarous infidel, and such like: 'Tis incredible

incredible to think what a vast number of diamond necklaces, pendants, ear-rings, besides other valuable trinkets, he obscured in the strong boxes of usurers and extortioners, by means of this fleece; so that on a royal birth day, the fair owners of them are generally seized with some sudden illness, or obliged to retire into the country, on affairs of the last importance, or to devise some cunning stratagem or other, to account for their not appearing in public on those occasions. We heard of a very great and wise Lord, who being perplexed with his wife's debts of honour, tied her to a bed-post, and gave her good wholesome family discipline; but this had no other effect on her high-breeding, than to put her upon an attempt to poison herself. What numberless instances could I give of Lords, Ladies, Generals, Colonels, and Esquires, some of whom have lost their whole estates, others the most part; others again have laid themselves under such difficulties, that their annual income has fallen very short to supply them with the common necessaries of life; so that they have been obliged to live upon credit many years. And as for ladies, whose pride would not permit them to live upon credit, they have been obliged to make a more modish satisfaction, by prostituting their bodies to the fellows they have lost great sums of money to. Could we look into the mind of one of these female gamesters, we should see it full of nothing but trumps and mattadores; her slumbers are haunted with Kings, Queens, and Knaves, shuffling, cutting, dealing, and sorting out a pack of cards. A certain great lady, during the time of her pregnancy, had filled her imagination so strongly with cards and dice, that the child she produced (who now trails a pike in the guards) is very visibly marked on the forehead with a dice-box. As for their general disposition for suicide, a man of quality once having some words with his wife, she, in the height of her fury, reproached him with the name of cuckold, although she had six or seven children living. The gentleman told her, that if she had thus played him one trick, he would soon play her another; and accordingly he went and pistoled himself immediately, by which his estate became forfeited, and the wife and her bastards justly reduced to beggary.

Bastardy, and Legal Botheration.

ON Wednesday, August 26, Ann Fitzgerald, otherwise Barry, was brought before the Sitting Magistrate, at Hatton Garden, on a warrant obtained against her by Counsellor A——, of the Temple, for riotous behaviour at his Chambers.

It appeared by the evidence of Mr. A——'s Clerk, that, in the absence of his Master, this woman burst into the chambers, and laid down a child, which he understood to have been filiated upon his Master; that he represented to her he could not let the child stay, having had positive orders to the contrary. Upon his taking out the child, the woman began to break the windows and furniture and make a noise, and went into the court and collected together a great mob of people.

Counsellor R——, who attended as Mr. A——'s friend, stated, in an Irish accent, that he heard a most horrible and hideous noise, something like the breaking of empty bottles filled with wine; and sent forth his handmaid to see if his cellar was on fire; that it alarmed him him exceedingly; that he had lately bought the Chambers he occupied, in the same Court with those of Mr. A——; that he was consequently a Freeholder; and that he did not like to be disturbed. If such uproars as these, he said, went on, he should never expect to get the half of what he gave for them, nor let them for a quarter of what they were worth! and must beg such riotous and drunken proceedings might be put a stop to, he being an enemy to irregularity and late hours, and endeavouring—although sometimes in vain—to be in bed about ten o'clock every evening.

Another gentleman heard the noise at some distance, and said this was the case nearly every day, as had been the evening before.

Ann Fitzgerald, the woman, made a long and abusive harangue, reflecting very unjustifiably upon Mr. A.; but admitted the riot; said that she wanted shoes for the child; that she was only allowed half-a-crown a week to maintain it, which was not enough; that Mr. A. ought to give more. It was to get him to provide better for the child (which every one present remarked to be extremely like Mr. A.) that she went near him.

The Magistrate, Mr. Blamaire, observed, that if learned gentlemen would take liberties with ladies, they would, in return, take liberties with them. He hoped, however, that this would operate on all present to be prudent and virtuous. The worthy Magistrate recommended, in the strongest terms, matrimony, as the best method of obviating such terrible grievances; but at the same time told the woman she had acted very improperly; advised her to take the child to the parish; with assurances, that, if ever she committed any other outrage, she should be severely punished.

SUSSEX ASSIZES.

LEWES, AUG. 1.

Before LORD KENYON and a SPECIAL JURY.

RICE v. CHUTE.

PECULATION IN THE PURCHASE OF FORAGE.

MR. Garrow said, it was with real concern, he was necessitated to lay this case before the Jury and the Public, because it involved in it the misconduct of an officer of a fencible corps of cavalry. It was much to be lamented that the friends of the defendant had not advised him to withdraw from the present contest, and prevent even the bare statement of the facts that had given rise to it. It was an action brought by the plaintiff, a tradesman at Brighton, to recover the value of a quantity of oats, furnished as forage, for the troops under the command of the defendant. It was a circumstance no less notorious than it was to be lamented, that the different tradesmen of Brighton had been obliged to bring actions against the defendant, and other officers of the Hampshire fencibles, for articles they had received for the use of their troops. He should not only shew that the defendant actually received the goods for which this action was brought, but that he made an immense profit by cutting down the measures, and defrauding the horses of their allowance of oats, and the troops of their allowance of bread. The public mischief which might ensue from such a conduct was incalculable; for it was almost idle to observe, that at the moment when the rashness of the enemy should urge them to make a descent on the shores of this country, nothing was more material for for the resistance of such an enemy, than that our own troops and horses should be in the best possible condition; but what could be expected from their exertions, if they were deprived of that due allowance of provisions, without which their strength could not be supported? The defendant, though he had in dereliction of his duty, and in violation of the confidence reposed in him, appropriated to his own emolument part of the articles furnished by the plaintiff, had, nevertheless, had the boldness to have his conduct stated in a Court of Justice. To the honour of government, the regiment to which the defendant belonged was no longer retained in the service. It would be proved that this regiment of fencible cavalry went from place to place, robbing Peter to pay Paul, and anticipating in one town the allowance they were to receive in another. The officers kept drawing on the paymaster of the regiment for sums they had received, and were personally responsible for, and at last the paymaster becoming bankrupt and absconding, the tradesmen of Brighton were defrauded of many thousand pounds.

The present case had been tried before, and a verdict had been given for the plaintiff, under the direction of Mr. Justice Heath. He did not mention this that the Jury should return the same verdict, but only for the purpose of informing them that the sum recovered in the former action was four hundred pounds; and that a new trial had been moved for and granted, upon the ground that part of the articles had been furnished at a time when the defendant was absent on the recruiting service, and the Court were of opinion, that he was not liable for what was furnished during that period. The amount of that was one hundred and thirty-six pounds, which he, therefore, abandoned. The sum he went for was two hundred and eighty pounds, the amount of what was furnished after the defendant returned. It would be proved that the defendant saw and approved of the samples of oats delivered, and was, to all intents and purposes, answerable to the payment of them. There was an additional demand of forty-seven pounds for forage, after the paymaster had absconded. He repeated, that the first sum he abandoned in conformity to the opinion of the Court; but, with regard to the other two, he insisted there could be no doubt of his right to recover them.

Mr. Read said, he was clerk to Mr. Chute, Captain of the Hampshire corps of fencible cavalry, in the year 1799. He was quarter-master to the regiment, and clerk to the Captain, from the 15th of October, 1799, to the 20th of Feb. 1800, and remembered purchasing oats of Mr. John Rice, the plaintiff, to the amount of 453l.

Mr. Garrow again observed, that he abandoned all but two hundred and eighty-nine pounds three shillings.

Lord Kenyon said, he was sorry the defendant should have suffered such an action as this to have been brought forward; but, if people would run their heads against a wall, he could not prevent its hurting them.

Mr. Serjeant Shepherd observed, that a Committee had sat upon the subject of the plaintiff's demand, and had adjudged that he was answerable for what he had actually ordered.

Lord Kenyon said, he was answerable for what was ordered by his clerk. If the articles were delivered to the clerk, upon the credit of Mr. Chute, he was bound to pay for them, agreeable to the maxim, maxim, qui facit per alienum, facit per se.

Mr. Serjeant Shepherd said, that it was necessary the troops should have forage, and that somebody should give orders to the tradesmen to furnish it. The witness was clerk to the troop, and, in that capacity only, had given the orders for the articles, for which the action was brought.

Lord Kenyon—"You argue right, where persons give orders on account of government; it has been decided, that in such case, they are not personally answerable: but in this case, the plaintiff cannot go to the Treasury for his money."

Mr. Serjeant Shepherd said, if it was to be understood, that officers were to be responsible for the forage furnished for the troops, no one would be found willing to take such a risque upon himself; and, consequently, the service would be materially injured.

Mr. Read continued his evidence; he said, he had received orders from Captain Chute, to reduce the horses measure of oats from eight to five pounds. The government allowance for the horses was eight pounds per day. The defendant ordered the measures to be cut down to five pounds, thereby cheating government, and each horse, of three pounds a day.

Lord Kenyon—"Upon my word, I shall be obliged to send this to the Attorney General. I shall not mince the matter at all. In a case, which so materially affects the interest of the public, I shall not attend to the feelings of the parties; and, beyond all controversy, I shall lay this evidence before the Attorney General, the moment I reach town."

Mr. Read added, that Captain Chute gave directions for cutting down the measure, in the presence of Captain Baker, and Quarter-Master Rudd; they were afterwards reduced by John Watmore, of Captain Chute's troop, and sent to Captain Chute's lodgings, that he might see whether they were cut down according to his directions. He said, they were done perfectly right. At this time, Captain Chute bought his own corn for the troop.

Lord Kenyon—Has this defendant no friend in the world to advise him, to prevent this action's proceeding further?

The witness said, the measure the defendant had ordered to be cut down, was not used the whole of the time, because the circumstance had been reported to Major Beevor and Colonel Everitt.

Lord Kenyon--As soon as it was reported to them, that the measure was cut down, did they reject it?

Witness—Yes, they desired it to be altered.

Mr. Serjeant Shepherd asked the witness, whether the paymaster was not responsible for the forage ordered for the troop?

The witness replied, that the paymaster had nothing to do with the government allowance of corn. He stated further, that he frequently settled accounts with the defendant, during the time the small measure was used, and paid him the balances due to him. He did not recollect how much the defendant had pocketed by any one act of fraud, but, in the whole, he had cheated government of upwards of five hundred pounds, during the time he was his clerk. He said, he obtained the goods from the tradesmen at Brighton, certainly upon Mr. Chute's credit, and purchased the oats of Mr. Rice, solely on his account. None of the tradesmen ever expected any body else to pay them, but Captain Chute; and, in fact, he had had received the money from government to do so. The witness enumerated several sums of money, which, he said, he had seen paid to the defendant, by Captain Baker, on account of the corn, for which this action was brought.

On his cross-examination, he insisted, he had no share in this plunder of the public: he was only allowed after the rate of ten pounds a year for officiating as the clerk of Captain Chute. He produced several memorandums, which, he said, it would be proper to shew the Court.

Lord Kenyon refused to see them, observing, that the present was not a Court of Inquiry on the conduct of the officers of the regiment.

The witness said, in consequence of a complaint that the horses had too little, and were not able to go through their work, the measures were inspected, and Major Beevor threatened to put the witness under an arrest. During the time the short measure was used, the defendant made a regular saving, in the article of oats only, from eight pounds to ten pounds per month; a saving not allowed by the regulations of the army. The witness received the money for the corn, of which government was cheated, and the defendant received it from him; he had his receipt for it.

Lord Kenyon.—You say you made individual bargains on the credit of this man?

The witness replied, that he ordered the oats on the credit of Captain Chute, and expressly told Mr. Rice, the defendant was personally responsible. He remembered the defendant drawing a bill on the paymaster, who accepted it; but what became of that bill afterwards, he knew not; at that time there was money due from the paymaster to Chute. He was certain Rice did not trust the defendant on the paymaster's account; he did not know that the defendant had ever been absent from his regiment; he was at Arundel on the recruiting service, but that was not considered an absence from the regiment; the bills were made out in his name, and the amount of the savings were paid to him, whether he was absent or not; there was an account, which he the witness had in his hand, proving, that for seven months during which the defendant was absent from his regiment, he received sixty-five pounds.

Mr. Serjeant Shepherd observed, that if the credit of the Captain of a regiment could be pledged by his clerk, no man could serve his country in such capacity without the danger of being ruined by the responsibility attached to it.

Lord Kenyon.—I am pretty confident, from my knowledge of your character, that your better judgment is controuled in this case, otherwise it would not have been kept up so long. However, all I have said goes for nothing, if you can take away from my book this witness's testimony. As it stands at present there can be only one result, and that result is as clear as the sun.

Mr. Serjeant Shepherd confessed he was not in a situation to contradict what the witness had sworn.

Lord Kenyon said, no proposition could be more clear, or simple, than the right of the plaintiff to recover. "I am sorry (said his Lordship) for the honour of this man; but I have pledged myself to the public to lay this case before the Attorney General; and, if my memory does not fail me, when I reach town, I certainly shall do so."

A verdict was given for the plaintiff—damages, two hundred and eighty-nine pounds three shillings.

ASSAULT

Assault tried at the same Assizes.

Bristow v. Penfold.

This was an action to recover damages for an assault. The plaintiff was waiter at an inn, at which the farmers in the neighbourhood of Lewes assembled on market days. The defendant was a farmer, and, with a number of other persons of the same description, was in the room in which the dinner was to be served up. The defendant had purchased a piece of mechanism of singular utility, and of curious construction, and the plaintiff, pretending ignorance of its properties, took the liberty of enquiring what it was. The defendant replied that it was a man-trap, and used for the purpose of catching rogues and thieves.—"Aye, indeed," said the waiter; "then it would be a devilish good thing for the poor if it would catch some of you farmers; and, d—n me," he added, "I should like to see all your heads in it!" This apostrophe, energetically delivered, irritated the farmers to such a degree, that they took their sticks, and began hunting the poor waiter, and poking him on the sides, as the drovers do the beasts they are driving. The defendant was particularly active, and, by the time the plaintiff got out of the house, his arms, back, and sides, were variegated with all the colours of the rainbow, and it was not till after several weeks he recovered the use of his arms.

Mr. Serjeant Best, in his address to the Jury, inferred, that the plaintiff had, by his own imprudence, brought upon himself the chastisement he had met with, and therefore that the smallest compensation in damages would be sufficient.

The Jury gave a verdict in favour of the plaintiff, with Forty Shillings damages.

Game Laws.

The following case—Mitchen v. Hyde—was tried at the foregoing Assizes.

Mr. Serjeant Shepherd stated, that this was a qui tam action to recover two penalties upon the Game Laws; the one for killing game without being qualified, and the other for not taking out the annual certificate required by Act of Parliament.

A witness of the name of Basset was called to prove the case: he said he knew Mr. Hyde, who was a schoolmaster in Rutherford town. On the 9th of January last, he saw him on Mr. Tinuersley's grounds, in company with Mr. Fry and Mr. Barton; they had a gun each, and three or four spaniel dogs; they were hunting in the woods; he heard three or four guns go off one after another, and saw Fry, Barton, and the defendant, come back with what they had shot; he never knew of the defendant's having any estate, except the house he lived in.—[Mr. Garrow, in the course of his cross-examination, made the witness acknowledge, that, excepting himself, there was not a more notorious poacher in the county than the plaintiff, or one who had wired more hares.]—He said Fry and Barton were known as gentlemen of landed property, qualified to shoot game.

Mr. Garrow submitted, that there had been no case proved which entitled the plaintiff to recover these two penalties of the defendant, who was only a poor schoolmaster; the plaintiff and his friend had been fined for having had twenty wires for wiring hares, and sixteen nets for catching partridges, in in their possession, and had been prosecuted times out of number, and yet they had had the impudence to run the chance of recovering the penalties attached to a breach of the game laws of this poor man, the school-master, who was out with two gentlemen perfectly qualified. Before the Jury could give their verdict for either of the penalties, they must be satisfied he kept a gun for the purpose of killing game.—God forbid keeping a gun, or even using it, in times like these, should be deemed a crime: in fact, it was not an offence, unless employed for the destruction of game. How did this case stand? There were three persons with their guns and dogs; they went together into a wood, and three reports were heard; whether one person fired and loaded, and fired again, or all three fired, has not been proved; nothing had been proved, but that the defendant was in company with qualified persons, who were doing that for which the law justified them; the plaintiff's counsel had not ventured to call either Mr. Fry or Mr. Barton: he had no objection to the Jury's hearing their evidence, but he should also decline calling them, as he was perfectly satisfied with his client's case as it stood at present.

Lord Kenyon said, he was, upon the whole, no great enemy to the game laws, because they prevented the humbler classes of society misusing their time, which ought to be devoted to the labours of husbandry, and the support of their families. With regard to the penalty of twenty pounds for not taking out a certificate, it was certainly a very proper one; it had beat down all distinctions, and imposed a tax in aid of the revenue, upon all who thought proper to indulge themselves in the amusement of shooting.—The present case, however, was not made out quite to his satisfaction; it appeared that three persons had gone out together, two of them qualified, and one of them not qualified; the law authorised a person duly qualified to take with him a companion who had not a qualification, provided he only beat the bushes, and did not kill the game himself. It has been stated that the guns went off at intervals, and it was not impossible that the defendant had given his gun to one of the gentlemen after his own had been discharged—or perhaps they might have had double-barrelled guns—at least the contrary did not appear in evidence. He knew there were many gentlemen who went out attended by their servants, with double and triple-barrelled guns, that they might pursue, with more certainty of success, their horrible massacre of the feathered race; besides, the month of January was not the season for partridge, but woodcock-shooting, and he did not find that, in this march of destruction through the woods, the birds killed were partridges. It was not his way to explain away evidence, but in the present instance he did not think the evidence was that upon which a verdict ought to be given for the plaintiff: he would leave it to the gentlemen of the Jury to draw their own conclusion: if the decision rested with him, he should give it in favour of the defendant; and, unless the Jury had arrived at a moral certainty the defendant had fired one of the guns, he was persuaded they would adopt his sentiments.

The Jury consulted a few minutes, and returned a verdict for the defendant.

REVIEW

Review of Singular Occurrences,

In the Ferocity of Tigers, Jackals, Piah Dogs, Vultures, &c.

In the Life of Sarah Shade, born at Stoke Edith, in the County of Hereford. Containing well authenticated and curious facts, more particularly during her Voyage to the East Indies, in the New Devonshire Indiaman, in the year 1769, and, in traversing that country in company with the army, at the sieges of Pondicherry, Velore, Negapatam, &c. &c. Taken down by some Gentlemen for her benefit. 8vo. Pp. 44. 2s. Hatchard. 1801.

THE benevolent purpose for which this narrative is published, to afford relief to a distressed woman who appears to have experienced the vicissitudes of fortune in no common degree, entitle it to particular attention, and induce us to recommend it strongly to general perusal. It contains a number of most wonderful occurrences, and represents Mrs. Shade as a woman of extraordinary courage and constancy. She seems to have had many "hair-breadth 'scapes," not only "in the imminent deadly breach," though even there she has fought and bled, but in various situations of life. One of these we shall extract. It occurred during her residence at Tritchinopoly.

"Being in the habit of keeping pigeons in a place she had erected for them near her own habitation, and one morning, very early, hearing the pigeons disturbed, she went out to see what was the cause of it, when she perceived a tiger cat in the act of seizing one of her pigeons, on which she had the resolution to catch up a stick with intent to rescue the bird. At this moment the animal dropped the pigeon, and made a spring at her; when, stooping down to avoid the attack, and placing her hands together to keep the animal off, the tiger cat literally seized both her hands in his mouth, when fear gave her the resolution to grasp hold of the root of his tongue, so as to prevent, in a great measure, the animal's endeavours to bite her, though she bears to this day the marks of the contest; and lay long, in consequence, in a desperate state, attended by Doctors Lucas and Sinclair, who were attached to the garrison; but was ultimately cured by a poor Portuguese woman, who had come to ask the charity of a seer of rice. Such was the malignity of the bite and scratches of the animal, that she swelled to an almost inconceivable degree; and but for the timely appearance of her husband, and Serjeant Lamb of the Artillery, she would inevitably have fallen a sacrifice to her temerity; for though her husband pierced him with his bayonet near the heart, and Serjeant Lamb on the flank, it was with the greatest difficulty they could overcome the animal, and keep him down—a fact notorious to all the garrison, who flocked to see the creature when dead. Indeed, there is at this moment, a man of the name of John Anderson, an out-pensioner of Chelsea Hospital, then a serjeant at Tritchinopoly, who well remembers the circumstance."

Another extraordinary instance of the singular ferociousness of the tiger is related in the following passage.

"During one of the excursions from Tritchinopoly to Madras, with two battalions of sepoys, commanded by Captain Watts, another incident happened, shewing the undaunted ferocity of the tiger. A young woman, a native of the country, by whom Lieutenant Kennedy had a son, and who was near her time with another child, was carried off in the middle of the ranks, whilst riding on a bullock, by a large a large tiger, who sprang from out of the jungle, and seized her by the throat. The detachment halted in consequence; and, after a three days search, discovered the retreat of the animal, which proved to be a female, having two whelps about the size of terrier dogs. The dam was shot, and the young taken alive, and secured by muffling the fore paws, and muzzling their mouths. In the den, which was of the size of a moderate room, and in which a man could stand upright, were discovered various ornaments of dress; among the number, of which the narrator was an eye-witness, she recollects the following articles, besides those worn by the unfortunate female just mentioned; a star of real pearls set in gold, a gold watch, two silver watches, several pieces of gold chains much mutilated, a number of gold rings, and a gold snake, large enough to go round the body of a man, of considerable value, with various other valuable articles, and many bones belonging to unhappy persons who had fallen victims to the animal's ferocity. The two young tigers were afterwards sent as a present to the Nabob of Tritchinopoly."

This poor woman is now the wife of a carpenter, at Mary-le-bone, and in very reduced circumstances.

Shooting Match.

On Thursday, the 8th of September, a meeting of Gentlemen Volunteers took place, at Bermondsey Spa, to shoot at a target for a silver cup, given by the Proprietor of the Gardens. Those who intended to fire enrolled their names the preceding day. The number was limitted to one hundred, but only fifty-four were entered. They belonged to the following corps: Bermondsey, Loyal London, Langbourn Ward, Billingsgate, Bridge Ward, and Greenwich.

At six o'clock in the evening the firing commenced in the order of the muster roll. The whole fifty-four could not hit the target, which was twenty-four feet in circumference: the distance at which they stood was fifty yards.

A cessation of arms for a few minutes took place, when the Captain, at the head of the muster, acquainted the gentlemen of the respective corps, "that the proprietor of the cup, although fully entitled to consider it as his own, would not, from a point of honour, take possession of it without giving them another trial of skill; it was, therefore, his wish, that the firing should recommence."

The word of command to prime and load was given: when nearly dark, the 22d shot struck the target, not in the center, but at the extremity of the outer circle. Night came on, and then the 31st shot entered the white circle, just six inches from the bull's eye, and the 37th was nearly parallel.

The affair was referred to the judges, who gave it in favour of 31.

Mr. Chaplin, of Langbourne Ward Association, was the fortunate winner. Mr. Evans, of Greenwich, was the second shot.

Games of Hazard.

The following is the remarkable Ukase issued by His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia against Games of Hazard:

To the Baron Solenischtshew Kutusow, General of Infantry, and Minister at War, at St. Petersburgh.

It is with the utmost concern I inform you, that, notwithstanding the many prohibitory laws, the practice practice of hazard-playing, which no well-ordered government can tolerate, is here continued without regard to shame or decency. I consider this as an evil most pernicious in its consequence, and nothing less than a public and sanctioned robbery of the expectations of posterity; and I am sensible that, by conniving at it, it will take too deep root ever to be eradicated, particularly in those receptacles of vice, where infamous plunderers meditate in cold blood the destruction of whole families, and, by a single cast, wrest from the hands of inexperienced youth the inheritance of their ancestors, acquired perhaps by centuries of service and labour, violate every principle of honour and humanity, and not unfrequently bereave the innocent relatives of those they have ruined of the means of existence. I deem it an act of justice to direct the whole power of the law against a crime of such magnitude, and to prevent, ere it has acquired rigour, the dreadful consequences which may result from it. Therefore, I order you incessantly to use every means of discovering where unlawful games are played, to adopt such measures as may be necessary for suppressing them; to arrest the guilty, without regard to person or rank, and subject them to legal examination; and, at the same time, to transmit to me the names of all who shall be found offending.

"ALEXANDER."

St. Petersburgh,

FEAST OF WIT; OR, SPORTSMAN'S HALL.

AMERICAN WIT.

A Flourishing coxcomb went into a shop in New York, to try on a pair of boots. "These are too short for the ton (said he), they should cover the calf completely."—"Then (said the bootmaker) they must be about five feet ten inches."

The following circumstance lately took place on the Margate road:—A Barrister having taken up his quarters at an Inn, with the landlord of which he was acquainted, was consulted by the host what he should do in the case of a man who had brought an action against him, though he had in return a demand upon his creditor. The Barrister desired time to consider of it, as he said it was a nice case, and he would give his opinion in the morning.—When day broke he mounted his horse, and without troubling the landlord for a bill, left the following solution:—"I am of opinion that the best thing you can do is to follow my example, make a SETT OFF."

Epigram.—On the recent marriage of Miss Hannah More:—

Spotless she liv'd till past threescore;
But now poor HANNAH is no MORE!

Miss Melon, walking in a garden at Plymouth, with a party of ladies and gentlemen, the proprietor informed the ladies they might eat plentifully of fruit, for there was none forbidden in that garden.—"Excepting Melon"—replied the sprightly young actress—a repartee, which, from the pointed manner of its delivery, did not fail to produce its full effect on the company.

T t produce

The following curious caution appeared lately upon a market-cross, in one of the midland counties. "To the Constables of *. If you do not take notice of the vagrants which infest this town, some notice will be taken of you!"

The following valuable receipt is literally copied from a London paper:—"Take the branch of a vine, and turn it down into the earth; let the mould cover it perfectly, and the next year it will produce cucumbers in constant succession."—There is so much of the brogue in this, that it reminds us of the advertisement of an Irish gardener, who once advertised cabbage-seed for sale, that would produce journeymen tailors!

Mrs. S. a young widow in the City, buried her husband last month, aged sixty-seven. Being asked one morning by a friend from the country—"Where was her dear old gentleman?" The sprightly widow replied with a smile—"He only went in the long coach to Grave's—end."

The Provincial Papers are full of accidents of ladies suffering by their muslin dresses taking fire. These accidents have, in some instances, proved fatal; and yet, if we may be allowed to jest upon such an occasion, no precaution is sufficient to put females on their guard against sparks!

The Quaker and Curate.—After the ceremony of marriage, the Curate demanded five shillings as his due.—"How dost thou prove from Scripture," said the Quaker, "that thou oughtest to have from me such a share of earthly mammon?"—"Why," replied the Curate, "I take it for granted, that the person you have just been married to is a woman of good character; and Solomon, in his Proverbs, observes, that a virtuous woman is a crown to her husband." The Quaker paid the money.

Quin and the Key of the Wine Cellar.—This famous epicure had been dining with a rich man, who was sparing of his wine. After they had drank one bottle, his host expressed his concern to Quin, that he could offer him no more, for that he had lost the key of his wine-cellar.—"But come, (says he to his guest) and I will show you, while the coffee is getting ready, some natural curiosities; and, among the rest, an ostrich.—Do you know, Sir, that this bird (going up to him) has one very remarkable property."—"What's that?" said Quin.—"Why, Sir, he swallows iron."—"Does he? (replied Quin) then very likely he has swallowed the key of your wine cellar."

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

ONE day, about the beginning of the present month, as Mr. Bull, of Lewes, was partridge-shooting, near Ringmer, his attention was suddenly attracted by a large flock of birds, consisting of four or five hundred, on the wing, high in the air, at which he shot, and brought one to the ground. It proved to be a beautiful specimen of the Knot, as accurately described by Edwards, except that the breast of this bird was red (probably the discriminating character of of the male), and that of the one he has figured, white and small dusky spots. There is something singular in the appellation of this bird, inasmuch as it is reported to have a royal origin. Canute, or Knute, or Knot, the Danish King of England, is said to have been remarkably fond of its flesh, from which circumstance the bird is supposed to have been named after that monarch, and its original name seems to be totally lost. It is the Tringa Canutus of Linnæus and Gmelin; and the Canute of Buffon; so that the Royal appellation is generally recognised.

Anecdote.—Tupor, who was many years gamekeeper to Sir H. Mildmay, in Hampshire, actually broke in a spayed sow to find game, back and stand, as staunch as any pointer, which he called Slut, and shot a considerable quantity of game to her. Slut, was otherwise very sagacious; for, one day, by way of trial, she was desired to find Tupor in the midst of a crowd, and she instantly made her way betwixt the legs of a number of persons, until she had reached her master: after whose decease she was sold by auction for a considerable sum.—Tupor had as fine an eye as his pig had a nose, for he was an extraordinary shot; he would hit a cricket ball with a bullet from a fowling-piece, when bowled with the greatest velocity, and at a considerable distance.

A party of gentlemen shooting lately near Lord Scarborough's, one of them perceived a couple of snakes near the root of an old tree, at which he fired. Having approached them they appeared motionless, of a beautiful colour, and about two feet and a half long. A peasant, who attended the parties, tied a handkerchief round the middle of the snakes and flung them over his shoulder; but, in the course of a few minutes, to his surprise, he found himself severely bit by one of the animals in the neck, which seemed to have been only stunned by the noise. The other also began to writhe, but they were afterwards killed by a bludgeon. The party procured the best medical assistance for the poor man; but the poison was so venomous that no hopes are entertained of his recovery.

Complaints having been preferred against several officers of the army, for shooting and coursing, without the previous permission of the owner of the freehold, a resolution is said to be adopted, on a charge of a similar trespass being substantiated at the War-Office, to enforce the penalty of the law, by which the offender is liable to forfeit his commission.

In the late presentment at Trim, in the county of Meath, a curious item passed in the usual accounts, viz. four pounds thirteen shillings, to a person for killing magpies, which it is supposed are considered as very destructive in that part of the country. The premium is 4d. a-piece, and the person who claims is obliged to produce their heads to entitle him to payment.—The claimant in this case was a knowing one, and an old shot, and, on exhibiting the skulls of two hundred and seventy-nine slaughtered mags, it was opposed against him that he had not killed that species of them which were most destructive, but had got to the nests of those birds, and wrung off the heads of the young ones. To destroy them any way, however, was considered a service, and the sum was ordered to be paid.

Mr. Barrow, in his Travels in Southern Africa, lately published, relates a singular instance of the ferocity of a female Zebra, which had been domesticated when young, but but had, with age, become extremely vicious:—"One of the English Dragoons persisted in mounting her. She kicked and plunged, and laid herself down, but to no purpose: the man kept his seat; till, taking a leap from the high bank of the river, she threw him into the water; but, holding fast by the bridle, she had no sooner dragged him to the shore, than, walking up quietly to him, she put her head down to his face, and completely bit off his ear."

The following description of a horse at Warwick Races is rather whimsical—"Mr. Durand's ch. c. Morgan Rattler, by Mr. Teazle, out of Mrs. Siddons!"

The Citoyen Francais observes, that the celebrated horse, Overton, died in the Haram of Mr. Hutchinson, near York.

At a bull-baiting, at Eccles Annual Wake, near Manchester, some days ago, a man, in a state of inebriety, approaching the half-worried irritated animal too nearly, was so shockingly gored, that he languished in the most excruciating agonies upwards of thirty hours, when death put a period to his sufferings.

Died, on the 1st of September, Mr. Henry Willis, master of the Fox and Hounds Livery Stables, Surry Road. His death was occasioned by a fall from his horse, which took fright, as Mr. W. was mounting him the day before, at the Horns, at Kennington.

A gentleman in Inverness-shire lately shot fifty-two brace of moorfowl in a day. He did not fire at a bird when sitting, nor did he shoot more than one bird at a time. Considerable betts were depending.

Mr. Hanbury's celebrated Essex fox-hounds, have derived a considerable accession, by a junction with Mr. Coe Pigott's pack.

In the parish of St. George, Cannon-street, Ratcliff Highway, there is an institution founded by Mr. Raine, whereby young women, who have been four years in the school, four in the hospital, and five in service, are entitled to draw lots for a wedding portion of one hundred pounds. The days of drawing, are May-day, and the day after Christmas-day; when six of the young women, who have previously laid in their claims, draw tickets, which consist of five blanks and one prize: but those who are unfortunate one time, are not precluded an half-yearly chance as long as they live. But if the fortunate maid cannot find a man, who will marry her, on that day six months from which she draws the fortunate lot, she forfeits her right to the one hundred pounds, which is otherwise then paid. Whenever this ceremony takes place, the concourse of people is immense, and the interest, which such an institution has, on the feelings of the young female spectators, is wonderful.

Miss Robertson, lately of Blackheath, has published from Huntingdon Gaol, a Pamphlet, entitled, "Who are the Swindlers?"—not so much to vindicate her own conduct as to abuse her adversaries. The Pamphlet is written with a dexterity and address, such as might be expected from the woman who was capable of so many artifices. It is marked also with the wild folly of her who could have the weakness to suppose that all these artifices were not to have a bad end. She publishes this account of herself chiefly for the purpose of levying, on the general curiosity, a small tax for her own support, and that of Miss Sharpe her companion. She is certainly a clever woman, and a confident one. Amongst other things she complains of her creditors seizing Miss Sharpe's Sharpe's property along with her own, and of Mr. Allnut, the keeper of Huntingdon gaol, making a show of her. In some parts of her production, she arrives at the very perfection of female scolding, and in others, the Lady affects to be keen, sarcastic, and witty; when playing upon the name of Mr. All-nut, above-mentioned, she says, "I have cracked this nut, but find it all shell, without a kernel of politeness, or the milk of humanity."

Miss De Camp is variously described in her theatrical tour. At Birmingham, she was said to be a neat article; at Sheffield, as sharp as a razor; and, at York, as plump as a partridge.

An old maiden lady, in the North of England, advertises, that she has reserved her premises from all sportsmen, except such as may have a licence from the Vicar of the parish.

A post-boy from the Angel Inn, Sheffield, driving a chaise into the river Dun, for the purpose of washing it, was carried away by the rapidity of the stream, owing to the heavy rain, and lost his life. The two valuable horses were also drowned, and the chaise broken to pieces.

The following melancholy event took place on Holy Island Sands, the beginning of this month. Two postillions, in the service of Mr. Maddocks, vintner, of Wooler Haugh head, were, on the afternoon, employed with four horses, in conveying a gentleman's carriage, in which were himself and family, to Holy Island. About nine in the evening, the postillions set out on their return homewards, with their horses, and shortly after a thick fog came on. Apprehensions were, in consequence, entertained by the islanders for their safety, which next morning were found too fatally verified: for soon after day-light, the bodies of the two unfortunate men, and one of the horses, were discovered lifeless on the sandy waste. Another horse, which survived, stood motionless beside its dead companion. The remaining two were missing; nor have we yet heard whether they have been found, or whether we must conclude that they were buried in quicksand.

A few days since, a bird-catcher, probably from Whitechapel, exhibited for sale, at Lewes, a new class of birds, which he denominated Mules, and asserted, were generated between the Green-finch and Canary-birds. Their heads were ornamented with a curious tuft or crest, and their tails were of peculiar form, fashion, and colour, to which the recommendation of being fine songsters was added. They soon caught the eyes and pockets of some of the professed Lewes bird-fanciers, each of whom proudly enjoyed the gratification of exhibiting his pretty warbler as a Rara Avis, for a few days, and until the birds had discovered the cheat, by moulting off their false crowns and tails, which had been dexterously stuck on by the ingenious fancy-monger.

Rowing Match.—The Annual Regatta of St. Paul's, Deptford, took place on Tuesday, the 15th of September. The prizes were as follow:—

To the first man, a boat, value Eighteen Guineas.—

Second man, cash—Two Guineas.

Third man, ditto—One Guinea.

Four below bridge men started as follow:—John Acton, William Gifford, Isaac Large, and —— Atkins. After rowing four heats, in the course of which great skill was shown, the Prizes were determined as follows:—The boat to John Acton, two guineas to Isaac Large, and one guinea to William Gifford:

Gifford; after which they landed at Greenland Dock Stairs, from whence the winner was carried in the boat to St. Helena Gardens, where an entertainment was provided by the subscribers.

A very curious circumstance occurred lately near Saffron Walden, which was witnessed by several people. A vast number of swifts and swallows assembled in the air, apparently for the purpose of taking their departure to another climate, when a battle ensued, in which several of them were killed. One gentleman picked up seven which had perished in the conflict. None others of the feathered tribe mingled in the fight, which did not end until the combatants were wrapped in darkness.

Mr. Barclay, of Ury, has made a wager for five thousand guineas, with Mr. Fletcher, of Ballinshoe, that he will walk ninety miles in twenty-one hours and an half, to be be decided some time in the month of November. Our readers will recollect, that Mr. Barclay formerly undertook to walk the same distance in the same given time, for a wager of two thousand guineas with Mr. Fletcher, which he lost, on account of his having over-fatigued himself at setting out.—Cal. Mercury.

Mr. Robert Foster, of Howden, Yorkshire, has a blood mare, that has carried the post-boys for two years, every day, from Howden to Thorne, and back, which is twenty-eight miles in the whole, amounting to twenty thousand four hundred and forty miles. Since the post has been altered, which was three years ago, the same mare has carried the post-boy to Silby, and back to Howden, which is twenty-four miles a day, amounting to twenty-six thousand two hundred and eighty miles; so that, in five years, the mare has carried the mail forty-nine thousand seven hundred and twenty miles. She still continues to carry the mail from Howden to Silby, with seeming great ease. It has been often asserted that no horse was able to go twenty miles a-day for a whole year. The mare cost only ten pounds six years ago.

Boxing.—On Wednesday the 5th instant, the coroner's inquest sat on the body of Edward Bibba, who was killed in a battle, on Monday evening the 3d instant, in a field near Newtown, in the parish of Baschurch. The circumstances relating to this melancholy event are as follows:—

The battle consisted of twenty-six rounds; towards the latter part of it, the daughter of the deceased, about twelve years of age, the youngest of four children, broke through the crowd, which was numerous, and had prevailed on her father to go home with her; unfortunately her filial duty was not properly seconded: she was separated from her father for the last time, and he was encouraged fatally to go on; and in a few minutes received the blow which put an end to his existence: much unavailing sorrow was then shewn by the spectators; and particularly by his antagonist, who was perhaps the person the least blameable on the present occasion, as he had received the provocation, and also the first blow.

Belcher and Burk met, on Saturday, the 12th instant, at a house in Spitalfields, when, after some words, a challenge ensued. Mr. B. advanced one hundred pounds on the part of Burk, and Captain B. the same sum for Belcher, agreeing to decide the contest on the 19th. The parties met, agreeably to appointment, at the Cock, in Sun-street, Spitalfields, whence they were to proceed to the scene of action; but the affair having been divulged, not only a vast crowd crowd was collected to witness the combat, but the peace-officers interposing their irresistible authority, the battle was inevitably postponed to a future day.

Some days since, two hair-dressers, of Bath, having quarrelled in a public-house, retired to King's Mead-fields, to fight it out; the one was a tall lank man; the other short, thick, and plothotic; after a few rounds, the combatant whose rotundity unfitted him for a work of lasting prowess, just found breath sufficient to whisper forth, "I'll fight no more." The other, anxiously catching the half-formed sounds, asked "what does he say?" "say (cried out the second), why he says he'll fight another hour." "The devil he does (rejoined the other), then I'll fight no longer." Fatty was declared victor, and carried from the field in triumph.

Accidents from Fowling Pieces, &c.—The following melancholy accident happened in a field in the parish of Hallow, near the city of Worcester, on Monday the 7th instant:—On the morning of that day, Mr. Henry Williams, aged twenty-one years, fourth son of the late John Williams, Esq. of St. John's, went out for the purpose of shooting partridges, taking with him a double-barrelled gun. On finding birds, he is supposed to have discharged one of the barrels only, and in the act of stooping to pick up the game, the other barrel, it is thought, went off, the whole contents of which entered his head. From the appearance of the wound he is conjectured to have died instantly. His body was not discovered till Tuesday morning about eleven o'clock, when his two pointer dogs were found faithfully guarding their unfortunate master. He was a young gentleman of great promise, and highly respected by all who knew him. A coroner's inquest was taken on Wednesday morning, Verdict — Accidental death.

At Wrigglesworth, in Hertfordshire, as Miss Holdinath, the daughter of a respectable paviour, in Spa-fields, who was on a visit to her grandmother, in Hertfordshire, was amusing herself with her cousin, a young man, about twenty-four years of age, she inadvertently took up a loaded gun, and jocularly pointing it at his breast, it unfortunately went off. The contents went through his heart, and killed him on the spot. The poor girl, who is not more than sixteen years of age, has been in convulsions ever since the fatal accident took place.

As Lord Douglas, and his son, the Honourable Archibald Douglas, now twenty-seven years of age, and commanding the Angusshire Militia, were lately on a shooting party near Aberdeen, Mr. Douglas's double-barrelled gun burst on the first shot, and completely tore off the fore finger of his left hand, shattered the others, and also his arm in so dreadful a manner, that it was doubted, for several days, whether an amputation could be avoided. The explosion was so great, that the two locks, barrels, and stock, were also shattered to pieces.

As Mr. Adam King, of West Mersea, was going to Colchester, on Thursday, the 3d instant, when he had got near the town, a gentleman shot at a bird crossing the road, and accidentally lodged part of the charge in Mr. King's right side: he happened luckily to have on a thick great coat, which prevented him from being much injured.

One day, during the present month, a person, named George Johnson, living near Northallerton, imprudently loaded his gun with small stones instead of shot, to shoot shoot at some crows, when the piece bursting, wounded him so severely in his left hand as to occasion his death.

Some evenings since, at Hendon, a gentleman's servant firing off the contents of a blunderbuss, his left hand under the charge by the bursting of the piece, was severed from the wrist, and carried to a considerable distance by the explosion; surgical assistance was immediately procured to render him all necessary relief.

On the 17th instant, as Mr. Runciman, of Birchmore-house, near Woburn, Bedfordshire, was putting a gun into a bag, he shook it to get it in, and his man having been entrusted with it to shoot a dog, he had imprudently left it cocked: it went off when the muzzle was close to his left foot, which was mangled in a most shocking manner. In this dreadful state he had the fortitude to ride to Woburn on horseback, to a surgeon, when he was obliged to undergo an amputation of the great toe, and the adjoining one. He is now in a fair way of doing well.

On the 31st of July, and the following day, a Court Martial was held on Lieutenant Thomas Phillips, of the Scilly Fencibles, (Major Short, D. J. Advocate,) for sending a challenge to Lieut. J. Johns, of the Royal Invalids, on the 25th of June last, requiring satisfaction for being expelled a Masonic Lodge, on the 24th of June (St. John's day): and having declared, on a subsequent day, that, the said Lieutenant J. Johns was a coward. The Court Martial found him guilty of both charges, and judged him to be cashiered; but in consideration of his youth and inexperience, and general good character, humbly recommended him to his Majesty's clemency. His Majesty, however, having taken into consideration all the circumstances of the case, deemed it necessary, for the sake of example, to confirm the sentence of the Court Martial.

A poney race for ten guineas was run for at the St. Helena, on the Deptford Road, on Monday afternoon, (Sept. 21,) by three famous ponies. The winning poney (Margate) fell, just after he passed the winning post, and rolled upon the young lad who rode him, who was so much hurt as to be taken off the ground senseless, and, we are sorry to add, is still in a very dangerous way.

On the 23d instant, at the Mansion House, the noted Mrs. Barrington, and two other females, were charged before the Lord Mayor, with having robbed a gentleman of his pocket book in Fleet-street. The constable who had them in custody, told his Lordship, that the gentleman, whose name is Davies, had been surrounded by these women, and that they had picked his pocket of this book; but there being nothing valuable in it, he supposed was the reason Mr. Davies did not attend. The pocket book was conveyed away. The Lord Mayor observed, that she was too old a practitioner to be suffered to go at large. They were ordered to be remanded, and the person whose pocket was picked ordered to attend.

On the morning of the 23d inst. as a tradesman in Market-street, Lancaster, was opening his shop, he was surprised at seeing a partridge running across the street, and taking shelter in a cellar, where he caught it, brought it home, and kept it in a pen till the evening, when a friend coming to see it, he opened the door of the pen, and it immediately flew out, darted through a pane of glass in the window, and escaped. It had no apparent wound when taken.

POETRY.

THE HIGH COURT OF DIANA.

THE CAMBRIDGE SCHOLAR, AND THE GHOST OF A SCRAG OF MUTTON

In the days which are past, by the bank of a stream
Whose waters but softly were flowing,
With ivy o'ergrown, an old mansion-house stood,
That was built on the skirts of a chilling damp wood,
Where the yew-tree and cypress were growing.

The villagers shook as they pass'd by the doors,
When they rested at eve from their labours;
And the traveller many a furlong went round,
If his ears once admitted the terrific sound
Of the tale that was told by the neighbours.

They said, that the house on the skirts of the wood
By a saucer-ey'd Ghost was infested,
Who fill'd ev'ry heart with confusion and fright,
By assuming strange shapes in the dead of the night;
Shapes monstrous, and foul, and detested.

And truly, they said, and the master well knew
That the Ghost was the greatest of evils;
For no sooner the bell of the mansion told one
Than the frolicksome imp in a fury began,
To caper like ten thousand devils.

He appeared in forms the most strange and uncouth,
Sure never was goblin so daring!
He utter'd loud shrieks and most horrible cries,
Curs'd his body and bones, and his sweet little eyes,
Till his impudence grew beyond bearing.

Just at this nick o'time, when the Master's sad heart
With anguish and sorrow was swelling,
He heard that a scholar, with science replete,
Full of mystical lore as an egg is with meat,
Had taken at Cambridge a dwelling.

The scholar was vers'd in all magical arts
Most famous was he throughout college;
To the Red Sea full many an unquiet ghost,
To repose with King Pharoah and his mighty host,
He had sent, through his powerful knowledge.

To this scholar so learned, the master he went,
And as lowly he bent with submission,
Told the freaks of the ghost, and the horrible frights
That prevented his household from resting o'nights,
And offered this humble petition:—

" That he, the said scholar, in wisdom so wise,
" Would the mischievous fiend lay in fetters;
" Then send him in torments for ever to dwell,
" To the nethermost pit of the nethermost Hell,
" For destroying the sleep of his betters."

"The scholar so vers'd in all mystical lore,
Told the master his pray'r should be granted ;—
Then order'd his horse to be saddled with speed,
And perch'd on the back of the cream-colour'd steed,
Trotted off to the house that was haunted.

He enter'd the doors at the fall o'the night,
The trees of the forest 'gan shiver ;
The hoarse raven croak'd, and blue burnt the light,
The owl loudly shriek'd, and pale with affright
The servants like aspins did quiver.

"Bring some turnips and milk!" the scholar he cry'd,
In a voice like the echoing thunder :—
They brought him some turnips, and suet beside,
Some milk, and a spoon, and his motions they ey'd,
Quite lost in conjecture and wonder.

He took up the turnips and peel'd off the skin,
Put them into a pot that was boiling ;
Spread a table and cloth, and made ready to sup,
Then call'd for a fork, and the turnips fish'd up
In a hurry, for they were a spoiling.

He mash'd up the turnips with butter and milk ;—
The hail at the casements 'gan clatter ;
Yet this scholar ne'er heeded the tempest without,
But raising his eyes, and turning about,
Ask'd the maid for a small wooden platter.

He mash'd up the turnips with pepper and salt—
The storm came on thicker and faster :
The lightnings blue flash'd, and with terrific din
The wind at each crevice and cranny came in,
Tearing up by the roots lath and plaster.

He mash'd up the turnips with nutmeg and spice,
The mess would have ravish'd a glutton ;
When, lo! his sharp bones hardly cover'd with skin,
The Ghost from a nook o'er the window peep'd in,
In the form of a Boil'd Scrag of Mutton.

"Ho! ho!" said the ghost, "what art doing below!"
The scholar look'd up in a twinkling—
"The times are too bad to afford any meat,
"So to render my turnips more pleasant to eat,
"A few grains of pepper I'm sprinkling."

Then he caught up a fork, and the mutton he seiz'd,
And sous'd it at once in the platter ;
Threw o'er it some salt, and a spoonful of fat,
And before the poor ghost cou'd tell what he was at,
He was gone!—like a mouse down the throat of a cat,
And this is the whole of the matter.

Cambridge, Aug. 3, 1801.

THE CAT AND PIGEON PIE.

A KITCHEN ELEGY.

O Mournful Muse! thy succour lend,
Whilst I attempt to sing
What dire disaster on a Cat,
A Pigeon Pie did bring.

This Cat was of the tabby tint,
Of seemly shape and size ;
And never did a more alert
The midnight Mouse surprize.

Her sides were sleek and soft as down,
For in the kitchen bred,
The purring Pet of Mistress Cook,
No doubt she was well fed.

But fav'rites of all sorts, we find,
To mischief are most prone ;
And thus with Tabby it turn'd out,
As shortly shall be shown.

It chanc'd, one day, some company,
Invited were to dine ;
Mark how unlucky incidents,
For dreadful issues join!

The Cook that morn, with special care,
A Pigeon Pie had made ;
Which, till each other dish was dress'd,
She in the larder laid.

Puss lick'd her lips, and whisk'd her tail,
And great her longing grew,
To taste this dish, whose sav'ry scent
She in the warm gale drew.

Wh-

[illegible] yes she sat and watch'd
[illegible] k'd larder door—
A[illegible] d, soon she slipt in,
And [illegible] n the floor.

The Cook came [illegible] mistrustsless still,
And thinking a[illegible] ecure;
Puss in a corner s[illegible] k'd behind—
Lock'd was aga[illegible] the door.

The door was lock'd—the prize in view—
And all was snug a[illegible] d still—
Then forth stepp'd Puss, and we may guess,
Ate Pigeon Pie her fill.

And now the foodful hour drew nigh,
The festal board was spread;
Each dish likewise, in order due,
Arrang'd from foot to head.

But here the sequel of my tale,
Most tragic to relate,
Comes on—the Pigeon Pie remain'd
To fill its vacant seat!

The Cook to bring it next with speed
Into the larder went;
But, O! what pen could paint the rage
That her vex'd bosom rent!

To see the dish, on which such pains
And care she did bestow—
To see it mangled thus, did make
Her heart with gall o'erflow!

She frown'd terrific, stamp'd, and swore,
As Cooks are apt to do,
That whoso did the foul misdeed
Should soon have cause to rue.

Tabby, who till that instant had
Remain'd by all unseen,
The keen-ey'd kitchen-maid descried,
Conceal'd behind a screen.

"Here, Mrs. Cook's the imp," she cries,
"That did the mischief do!"
Th' impassion'd Cook to wreak her wrath,
Upon her favourite flew.

With iron ladle in her hand,
Of large and pond'rous size,
She struck poor Tabby on the head,
Who flounces, screams, and dies!

Ye Cats, be warn'd by Tabby's fate,
Your appetites restrain;
Nor risk the wrath of angry Cooks
At dinner-time again.

HAFIZ.

HUNTING SONG.

TO the chase, to the chase, on the brow of the hill,
Let the hounds meet the sweet-breathing morn,
Whilst run to the welkin, their notes clear and shrill,
Join the sound of the heart-cheering horn.
What music celestial! when urging the race,
Sweet echo repeats—"To the chase, to the chase!"

Our pleasure transports us, how gay flies the hour!
Sweet health and quick spirits attend;
Not sweeter when evening convenes to the bower,
And we meet the lov'd smile of a friend.
See the Stag just before us! he starts at the cry—
He stops—his strength fails—speak, my friends—must he die?

His innocent aspect, while standing at bay,
His expression of anguish and pain,
All plead for compassion—your looks seem to say,
Let him bound o'er his forests again.
Quick, release him, to dart o'er the neighbouring plain,
Let him live—let him bound o'er his forests again.

PARODY OF SHAKESPEARE.

THE SEVEN STAGES OF A RACE HORSE.

AT first, the filly-foal,
Whining and skipping in the farmer's croft;
An then the unback'd colt, with curb and rein,
And smack of whip, pacing like a school-boy
Unwilling in trammels; and then the racer,
Starting like lightning, for the plate and matches,
Made at the Jockey Club; and then the hunter
Full of high keep, with coat as sleek as silk,
Perfect in limb, and proud of pedigree,
O'er five bars leaping; and for reputation
In foremost at the death. Then to mail-coach

In splendid show indignantly is harness'd;
All bath'd in sweat, with lash severe urg'd on,
To th' instant point of modern expedition,
And so he runs his stage; knock'd up, he shifts
Into the carrier's lean and gall'd pack-horse,
With load on back, panniers by his side,
On a bare mouthful starv'd of mouldy hay,
And "beans as clank as dog;"—the jade all night,
Wind-gall'd, with withers wrung, and coughing lies,
Unlitter'd on the ground; the next change ends
His cruel and unpitied destiny,
Sans eyes, sans hoof, meer carcase, left for hounds!

THE SOCIABLE.

BY MR. BOADEN.

PEACE to the soul of him, be whom it may,
Who first invented that light airy thing
They term a Sociable—no churl was he,
Nor car'd for solitary joy, if joy
Indeed can rise in solitary man.
It is the carriage which the country loves;
For its uncheck'd circumference of view
Seizes all beauties on her ample breast.
The coach but intersects each semi-sphere;
And the gales press unequally around.
The chariot gathers, whirling to the neck,
A piercing wind, distressful to the fair,
And all receding objects of the view
Shuts out. The Sociable alone combines
All charms of nature, comfort, and discourse.
I speak but of the country—in the town
Fancy can scarcely find a harmless whim
More risible than their's, who, in some road,
Choak'd up with dust, between two turnpikes drive
In social misery the hours away.
On as they roll, the circling clouds ascend,
Borne by the wind that chases them behind.
Their rapid movements shuns the sequent pest;
But as the carriage measures back its way,
The volumes they have rais'd descend secure,
And all the sandy treasure is their own.
Not such their ride, wh[illegible] drown,
Or bend their course to W[illegible] scarce
Remember aught [illegible]
Than not [illegible]. Though repell'd
By other [illegible] aspect
Veil'd [illegible] commanding sing[illegible]
To steal the [illegible] dew upon the lips
Of [illegible] did it as [illegible];
And instant hid the [illegible] of his face.
It is a subject interesting much,
To note the [illegible] coast displays
Within this [illegible] distance. [illegible]
In chalky [illegible] which [illegible]
Till Dover crowns them with her [illegible]
[illegible] displays a level line of [illegible]
O'er which the [illegible] does [illegible]
On [illegible] unmov'd. [illegible]
The [illegible] plain, nor does the [illegible]
Its pavement, though the [illegible] has wrought
A tessilated floor, beyond whate'er
Romans have left, beyond the Gothic boast,
O Canterbury, of thy Becket's shrine,
By pilgrim knees in other ages worn.

EPITAPH ON A FAVOURITE DOG.

Written by Mr. WALLER.

HERE lies poor WAG, most faithful of his tribe,
Who never fawn'd for pow'r, nor bark'd for bribe;
Fearful he was his master to offend—
Betray'd no trust, nor ever bit a friend!
So like Diogenes, that from a cub
He only wish'd plain victuals and a tub;
Nor envy'd he great folks their loaves and fishes,
Contented with his lot to—lick the dishes!
Jealous he was, and ever on the watch;
Nor durst a knave presume to touch the latch.
Much could I add, nor would my genius flag—
But 'tis enough—Farewell, poor, honest WAG!
